

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

man life, by a multiplicity of examples, which, while they gave an agreeable exercise to the mind by their variety, might familiarize it to that greatest of all studies the study of MAN. Montesquieu has this fine observation on authors: they should, he says, not so much make us read, as make us think. Il ne s'agit pas de faire lire, mais de faire penser. When I gave the articles-The Poverty of the Learned-The Persecuted Learned—The Imprisonment of the Learned—The Amusements of the Learned —The Progress of Old Age in New Studies -Poets, Philosophers, and Artists, made by Accident—&c. I considered them but as portions which relate to the history of Men of Genius. The discerning reader may thus trace other subjects elucidated, by impressing in his mind their component parts, scattered in this Miscellany.

I was desirous also to direct Taste, by Criticisms which should be illustrated by examples taken from the most finished compositions:

Thoughts—On teaching the Classics—Spanish Poetry—&c. Sometimes I proposed; to intersperse biographical sketches of persons remarkable in the republic of letters: such are the articles—Mademoiselle De Scudery—The Scaligers—Milton—Cardinal Richelieu—Corneille and Addison—&c. and sometimes I have attempted to sketch subjects of literary curiosity: such are—Literary Composition—Origin of Literary Journals—Recovery of Manuscripts—Sketches of Criticism—The Bibliomania—Errata— &c.

In the HISTORICAL SECTION, I proposed to arrange those incidents which might serve as materials for a history of human nature; to trace the usurpations of tyranny, and the glory of freedom; as is done in the account—of the Pouliats, and the Pouliches, taken from the Abbè Raynal, and which is contrasted with—the Thirteen Cantons; which is further displayed in the articles—

Feudal Tyranny—America—&c. To represent the avarice, the cruelty, and the impositions of Superstition; which are sufficiently marked in the articles—Trials and Proofs of Guilt in superstitious Ages—Inquisition—Mutual Persecution—Religious Enmity—Virgin Mary—&c. To paint the characters of kings, and of nation's; such are the articles—Monarchs—Edward IV.— Queen Elizabeth-Royal Divinities-Dethroned Monarchs—&c. The manners of nations are displayed in such articles as— Singularities observed by various Nations in their Repasts—The Athenians—The Italians -Spanish Etiquette-History of Poverty-Slavery—&c.

In the third portion of this Work, I proposed to give whatever I found curious for the singularity of the subject, or interesting from the importance of it's information: such articles are—Singular Memories—Light Summer Showers forming burning Mirrors—Origin of several valuable Discoveries—Music

Music—Hell—&c. And I have concluded this Miscellany by some Philological Observations, which may be regarded as a literary curiosity, by uniting in a few pages a succinct account of various Languages.

In a word, the scheme I proposed was as extensive and miscellaneous as life and as learning themselves. It should, perhaps, have been executed not by one person, but by the united talents of several: the solid column of Learning should have been ornamented by the graceful soliage of Genius.

Lord Bacon has observed, that men of learning require inventories of their know-ledge, as rich men have schedules of their estates. The present imperfect attempt may serve for this purpose, till a better is produced.

Of an essay of the present kind, the reward is frequently not gratifying to the Author. To most, industry will appear the only praise to which he can aspire. Fastidious, and half-literate minds are incapable of discriminating betwixt a heavy, undiscerning, and tasteless transcriber; and an elegant, reflecting, and spirited compiler. Viner abridged the Commentaries of Coke into twenty-two folio volumes; Viner is a dull and inelegant compiler. Sir William Blackstone, treading the same arid ground, knew the art of rearing on it many a beautiful flower. Baillet, Bouhours, and Rollin, are all compilers; but esteemed in every literary nation for their taste, their erudition, and their discernment. Some compilers resemble the dull and unfruitful drone, that wastes the treafures on which it exists; others, the beautiful and lively bee, that wanders on the bosom of the flowers; and, to appropriate an expression of Shakespeare, 'STEALING' and GIVING fweets.'

Inferior as my abilities are, I must remark, that the labours of a work like the present, most readers will not immediately discern. To rate, by a concise article, the labour labour that it cost, is an unjust mode of appreciation; for it is certain that very extensive reading is not infrequently bestowed on very limited articles—like waters, which, drawn from various fountains, when mingled together, appear indeed to be the effect of a single operation, although they contain the efforts of several.

The present edition solicits attention by very essential and copious improvements. Above one-third part of the volume consists of additional matter. But, notwithstanding this attempt to form an agreeable LITERA-RY MANUAL, I have rather made known, than accomplished my wish. Abundantly honoured, as I must consess I have been, with the approbation of Journalists I respect, and of Friends whom I esteem, I would render the work as perfect as my seeble talents permit. It is for this reason that I am desirous of the contributions of the Ingenious. The various heads may serve as out-knes or sketches for men of letters to fill up, as their reading or reflection suggest: and such a work can only be enriched by the accumulations of literary aid. I have received already several valuable hints; and if such liberal communications are continued, they will animate my future exertions, and tend to perfect a repository, which may not be unuseful in the Republic of Letters.

· I. D'ISRAELI:

PREFACE

TO THE FIRST EDITION.

THE present Volume partly consists of a laborious selection of the most interesting parts of the various ANA. To these valuable stores of Literature I have added some Anecdotes, which appeared to me amusive and curious; and some Observations, which, I hope, will not be deemed impertinent.

The ANA form a body of Literature not universally known. It may, therefore, be useful to inform the reader, that in the early part of the last century, it was a prevailing custom to take down for publication the Conversations, or 'Table-Talk,' as they have been sometimes called, of the most eminent Wits and Scholars. To satisfy the demands of Famine, rather than those of Literature, some were prompted to sell their Collections to the booksellers; and it may be fairly prefumed, were less attentive to the richness of the materials than to the number of pages they were calculated to fill. Others published them at the death of a valued Friend, to display the extent of his science, or the selicity of his genius; and it must be confessed, that even these were not so scrupulous as they should have been of what they admitted into their Collections.

Had such Repositories of Literature been judiciously formed, they would have proved a valuable acquisition to the Republic of Letters: but their respective Compilers have evinced great inattention, or little discernment; nothing was discriminated in the mass of their materials; they appear to have listened to the mouth of the Scholar whose sentiments they record, as the credulous Enthusiast did in ancient times to the Oracle he worshipped. Thus, whatever was unintelligible, obscure, or even false, was held by these Literary Devotees in as great reverence as it's opposite.

It has been repeatedly urged, and allowed, that the matter of elaborate Treatises, and even ponderous Volumes, may not infrequently be comprized in concise Essays, or short Remarks. Some things of this kind kind are attempted in the present Volume; and I have been prompted towards it's publication, by a conviction that it will furnish much useful information to the generality of readers.

It is not just, however, that curiosity should be raised too high. If expectations are formed, which are impossible to be gratisfied, abilities infinitely superior to mine must be humbled. All the Anecdotes I offer will not be new: of some, I pretend only to remind the reader; but the greater part, I have frequently been tempted to believe, will appear interesting.

The fashionable and commercial world are too much occupied to attend to serious discussion and scientific research; the one laboriously employed in doing nothing, and the other indefatigable in doing every thing. To the literary labourer they leave the cultivation of the sields and the gardens of Literature: they are willing to purchase the productions of his talents; but they expect to receive only the fruits and the semerality of readers, it is presumed, the present Collection will not be found unuseful. Whatever is most interesting in books rarely to be met with,

with, or whatever is most agreeable in compilations which it would be impossible for them to peruse with patience, is here selected: and, if it is not presumptuous to add, the Man of Letters, at the same time, may be reminded of important Observations, striking Anecdotes, and Attic Pleasantries; which, however they deserve to be retained, will, without some Vade Mecum of this kind, soon escape from the most tenacious memory. In a word, if this collection answers the hopes of the Editor, it will be found a Miscellany not unamusive to the Literary Lounger.

To be useful, and to please the Public, is my design. My work is not adapted to extend, or to bestow, reputation: it is sufficient, if it attains it's humble pretension. A multisarious Collection of this kind stands in great need of Critical Candour: yet I should feel myself little solicitous concerning it's reception, if I were certain that the urbanity of the Critic was to decide its sate.

LITERATURE.

LITERATURE AND CRITICISM.

THE ORIGIN OF LITERARY JOURNALS.

In the last century, it was a consolation, at least, for the unsuccessful writer, that he fell insensibly into oblivion. If he committed the private folly of printing what no one would purchase, he had only to settle the matter with his publisher: he was not arraigned at the public tribunal, as if he had committed a crime of magnitude. But, in those times, the nation was little addicted to the cultivation of letters: writers were then sew, and readers were not many.

Yop. I. B. When,

When, at length, a taste for literature spread itself through the body of the people, Vanity induced the inexperienced and the ignorant to aspire to literary honours. oppose these inroads into the haunts of the Muses, Periodical Criticism brandished it's formidable weapon; and it was by the fall of others that our greatest geniuses have been taught to rise. Multifarious writings produced multifarious strictures; and if the rays of criticism were not always of the strongest kind, yet so many continually isfuing, formed a focus, which has enlightened those whose occupations had otherwise never permitted them to judge of literary compositions.

The origin of so many Literary Journals is to be found in France. Denis de Sallo, Ecclesiastical Counsellor in the Parliament of Paris, invented the scheme of a work of this kind. On the 30th of May, 1665, appeared the first number of his Journal des Sçavans. What is remarkable, he published his Essay in the name of the Sieur de Hédouville, his footman. One is led to suppose, from this circumstance, that he entertained but a faint hope of success; or, perhaps, perhaps, he thought that the scurrility of criticism might be permitted, on account of it's supposed author. The work, however, met with so favourable a reception, that Sallo had the satisfaction of seeing it, in the next year, imitated throughout Europe; and his Journal, at the same time, translated into various languages. But, as most authors lay themselves too open to the severe critic, the animadversions of Sallo were given with such malignity of wit and asperity of criticism, that the Journal excited loud murmurs, and the most heart-moving complaints. Sallo, after having published only his third volume, felt the irritated wasps of literature thronging so thick about him, that he very gladly abdicated the throne of Criticism.

The reign of his successor, Abbé Gallois—intimidated by the fate of Sallo—was of a milder kind. He contented himself with merely giving the titles of books, accompanied with extracts. Such a conduct was not offensive to their authors, and yet was not unuseful to the public. I do not, however, mean to favour the idea, that this B 2 simple simple manner of noticing books is equal to sound and candid criticism.

The Journal of Leipsic, entitled Acta Eruditorum, appeared in 1682, under the conduct of the erudite Menkenius, Professor in the University of that city. The famous Bayle undertook, for Holland, a similar work, in 1684; and his Nouvelles de la Republique de Lettres appeared the first of May in that year. This new Journal was every where well received; and deserved to be so, for never were criticisms given with greater force. He possessed the art of comprizing, in short extracts, the justest notion of a book, without adding any thing irrelevant or impertinent. Bayle discontinued this work in 1687, after having given thirty-six volumes in 12mo. Bernard continued it to 1710, when it was finally closed. The celebrated Le Clerc has given his three Bibliotheques, which amount to the number of 74 volumes in 12mo; and who, if inferior to Bayle; is, notwithstanding, one of the best of our ancient Journalists.

A Mr. de la Roche formed an English Journal, entitled Memoirs of Literature, about about the commencement of this century. It consists chiefly of a translation from the foreign journals. It was afterwards continued by Mr. Reid, under the title of The Present. State of the Republic of Letters; but, being obliged to make a voyage to China, it interrupted his useful labours. He was succeeded by Messieurs Campbell and Webster. This fournal does by no means rival our modern Reviews. I do not perceive that the criticism is more valuable; and certainly the entertainment is inferior. Our elder, Journals seem only to notice a few of the best publications; and this not with great animation of sentiment, or elegance of diction.

It is impossible to form a Literary Journal in such a manner, as it might be wished a Literary Journal should be formed. For it must be the work of many of different tempers and views. An individual, however versatile and extensive his genius, would soon be exhausted.

The extent of the project, the continued novelty of the matter, and the complacence of considering one's self, in some shape, as the arbiter of literature, animate a journalist at the commencement of his career. But human nature is as much human nature in a journalist, as in any other man. Such strenuous exertions will fatigue the literary Hercules. To supply his pages, he gives copious extracts; by degrees the journal grows tedious, or is deficient in variety. The public whisper their complaints; they agree; and it is lost for ever. Thus it has happened that innumerable Journals have been projected, and have proved unfuccessful. Bayle, during a period of three years, was regular in this laborious pursuit, without relaxing his great powers; but this occasioned a dangerous illness, which obliged him to discontinue his literary labours. It was thus Mr. Maty fell a victim to his Review. It was, indeed, perverse in the latter not to accept an affociate. Maty had erudition; he was not deficient in literary history; perhaps his taste was not exquisite. He says, he only holds a monthly conversation with the Public. The magisterial air of criticism requires a terser style; his Journal is however replete with judicious criticisms.

Of Abbé Gallois, the successor of Sallo, it is observed, that he was frequently diverted from continuing his Journal with that regularity

regularity which the public has a right to expect. Fontenelle remarks, that this occupation was too restrictive for a mindso extensive as his: the Abbé could not resist the charms of indulging in any new production, of gratifying any sudden curiosity which seized him; and it was thus that the regularity which a Journal exacts was frequently sacrificed.

Camusat, on this subject, justly observes, that the passion of universal knowledge, is commendable; but as it can only be convenient to those who are perfect masters of their leisure, those studies which are our duties must always be preserved: so that the author who has not sufficient command over himself to restrain these starts of curiosity, will do well to leave to others the occupation of the journalist; for this function demands one who must entirely devote himself to the task, and whom nothing shall be capable of turning from his direct path.

Camusat, who has given a critical history of Journals, had formed very just notions how, one should be conducted. It had, indeed, been a phenomenon in the literary republic: but when this sage Aristarchus, who knew so well to plan with visionary perfection, attempted one himself, it is certain, as the editor of his papers observes, he did not practise one of those rules he had so judiciously prescribed to others.

The function of a journalist, according to Camusat, demands an extent of various knowledge, which can rarely be found in one person. Besides the learned languages, and a perfect knowledge of his own; and besides a tincture which he should have of the living languages, if he is desirous of giving an account of those works which are printed throughout Europe, he must also be, at least, tolerably acquainted with the subjects of which they treat; and, according as the occasion requires, he must shew himself a mathematician, astronomer, physician, lawyer, and divine. He must not be ignorant of what has passed in the most distant periods of antiquity; and he must be familiar with whatever has occurred in less remote times. Yet these are but a few of those qualities which are necessary to form a journalist. All these may be prejudicial to the public, by gaining their confidence, if he,

he, who assumes this character, does not add to his vast scientific acquisitions, talents more rare even than great erudition: viz. justness of conception, luminous ideas, a style pure and correct, lively and easy, adapted to fix the attention of the most indolent reader, and to persuade the most intractable. I add, that if a journalist is defirous of not committing, occasionally, very ridiculous blunders, or falling into inconveniencies yet more to be feared, he must possess a consummate knowledge of literary history, particularly that of bis own times; which, Fontenelle observes, is a science almost distinct from the others, although it refults from, and is produced by, a lively curiofity, which neglects nothing for it's purpose. Yet is it little, that all these qualities meet in one man, if they are not accompanied by goodness of beart: an exact probity, which will not allow him to practife any impositions; and which compels him to do justice to his enemies, if he is so unfortunate as to have any. It must be confessed, that such a character is more difficult to find, than to describe.

The journalists have been sometimes rallied lied by the wits for their appropriation of the regal pronoun we; yet, surely, without reason. The facetious Fuller, in his Worthies of England, in attempting to do away objections which may be made against his style, thus very acutely observes on this expression.

- Exception. You usurp the style of princes, speaking often in the plural: Come we
- 'now; passe we now; proceed we now,
- &c. which is false grammar from a single,
- 'ill ethics from a private person.
  - ' Answer. First, I appeal to any exercised - ' in reading of books, whether the same be
- onot used in other authors. Secondly, we,
- in such cases, includeth the writer and the
- ' reader; it being presumed that the eye of - the one goeth along with the pen of the
- other. Thirdly, it also comprize thall other
- writers, out of whom any thing is tran-
- fcribed, and their names quoted in the
- 'margin. And let me add, our WE is com-
- ' prehensive of all my worthy friends.'

It may gratify curiofity, to observe the improvements which gradually took place in Literary Journals.

When Sallo first undertook the Journal des des Sçavens, he did not give the names of the bookfellers; yet as the chief end of the work was to point out what books merited to be bought, it was found very necessary to give the names of the publishers. The Gentleman's Magazine, in it's Reviews, is deficient in this respect.

The first journalists did not specify the fixe of the work reviewed, nor the number of pages. Sometimes they gave the speets, which was rather perplexing. All these inconveniences were at length rectified.

They did not give the dates of the year when books were published, which occasioned many errors in the subsequent accounts of those writers who consulted the Journals. They omitted the dates purposely, because they did not always care to inform the reader that the book they noticed was an old one; for it might then have wanted the charm of novelty.

Literary intelligence was also added in time; and this is a source of very interesting matter to amateurs. It gives room for valuable notices, and curious anecdotes, which can find no where so proper a place. If journalists would correspond with each other.

other, the mere extracts of their letters, would preserve all the fugitive literary bif-tory.

Supplements were also projected by Sallo; but this useful invention was effected by others. They comprize that portion of valuable literature, to which the contracted limits of every Journal do not allow admittance.

It was long before the valuable aid of Indexes to Literary Journals took place. They were at first satisfied with giving, at the close of the year, a list of the books they had reviewed.

THE RECOVERY OF MANUSCRIPTS.

Poggius the Florentine found buried in a heap of dust, and in a rotten coffer belonging to the monastery of Saint Gal, the works of Quintilian; and, by this fortunate discovery, gave them to the Republic of Letters.

Papirius Masson found, in the house of a bookbinder of Lyons, the works of Agobart.

bart. The mechanic was on the point of using the manuscripts to line the covers of his books.

Raimond Soranzo, a celebrated lawyer in the Papal Court at Avignon, about the middle of the fourteenth century, had in his possession the two books of Cicero on Glory. He made a present of them to Petrarch, who lent them to an aged and poor man of letters, formerly his preceptor. Urged by extreme poverty, the old man pawned them; and, returning home, died suddenly, without having revealed where he had lest them: since which time they have never been recovered.

Leonard Aretin was one of the most distinguished scholars at the dawn of literature; but he has done that which reslects on him great dishonour. He found a Greek manuscript of Procopius de Bello Gothico. This he translated into Latin, and published the work as his own. Since, however, other manuscripts of the same work have been discovered; and the fraud of Leonard Aretin is apparent.

Machiavel acted more adroitly in a fimilar case. A manuscript of the Apophthegms of the Ancients, by Plutarch, having fallen into his hands, he selected those which pleased him, and put them into the mouth of one of his heroes.

A page of the second Decade of Livy was found by a man of letters on the parchment of his battledore, as he was amusing himself in the country. He ran directly to the maker of the battledore, but arrived too late; the man had finished the last page of Livy, in compleating a large order for these articles about a week before.

Sir Robert Cotton, being one day at his taylor's, discovered that the man held in his hand, ready to cut up for measures, the original Magna Charta, with all its appendages of seals and signatures. He bought this singular curiosity for a trisle; and recovered, in this manner, what had long been given over for lost.—As this anecdote is entirely new to me, it may be proper to point out that it is taken from the Colomessiana, page 198. The original Magna Charta is preserved in the Cotton Library; it exhibits marks of dilapidation; but whether these are the effects of time, or the taylor's scissors. I leave for the subject of an effay, for a future archæological vo-

By a supplication of Dr. Dee to Queen Mary, preserved in the Cotton Library, it appears that Tully's samous work, de Republica, was once extant in this kingdom, and perished at Canterbury.

A Treatise on Virtue, by Brutus, is also lost. It is mentioned by Seneca in his Confolation to Helvia, c. 9.

The Cardinal Granvelle carefully preserved all his letters; he left behind him feveral chefts filled with a prodigious quantity, written in different languages, commented, noted, and under-lined by his own These curious manuscripts, after his death, were left in a garret to the mercy of the rain and the rats. Five or fix of these chests were wanted by the steward; and he thought he acted wifely when he fold them to the grocers. It was then, a discovery was made of this treasure. Several learned men occupied themselves in collecting as many of these literary relics as they possibly could. What were saved formed eighty thick folios. Amongst these original letters, were found great numbers written by almost all the crowned crowned heads in Europe; and also instructions of ambassadors, and others, relative to the great political events of the times; and many of them were written by the hands of these illustrious personages.

Huet informs us that Petronius's works, of which we have now remaining only some fragments, were probably entire in the days of John of Salisbury, since this prelate notices several fragments which are not found in the present collection of his pieces.

It is about twenty years ago Montaigne's Journal of his travels into Italy were published. The recovery of the manuscript is well known to have been in this manner: M. Prunis, a prebendary of Perigord, in travelling through this province to make researches relative to a history of Perigord, which he had undertaken, arrived at the ancient chateau of Montaigne, in possession of the Count of Segur de la Roquette, a descendant of this great man. He stopped there to examine the archives, if there had been any. He was shewn an old wormeaten coffer, which had long held papers untouched by the incurious generations of Prunis, with philosophical in-Montaigne. trepidity, trepidity, cut his way through clouds of dust, and at length drew out the original manuscript of the travels of Montaigne; the only one which probably ever existed. He obtained permission of the Count to take it home, and examine it with care. After being well convinced of the legitimacy of the work, he carried these precious remains to Paris, where the connoisseurs unanimously acknowledged its authenticity. It is a thin folio of 178 pages. The writing and the paper are incontestibly fixed to be at the close of the sixteenth century. Two-thirds of the work are in the hand-writing of Montaigne, and the rest is written by a servant who served Montaigne for secretary, and who always speaks of his master in the third person. But he must have written what Montaigne dictated, as the expressions and the egotisms are all Montaigne's. was hardly intelligible, by the bad writing of the servant, and the irregular orthography. It proves also, says the editor, how true is that observation of Montaigne, when he says, that he was very negligent in the correction of his works.

Whether the Poems of Rowley be originals, adulterations, or the compositions of Vot: I. C Chatterton, Chatterton, I do not venture to decide: this, however, is certain, that the finding them in the worm-eaten cheft, in the ancient church at Bristol, has a very classical appearance, and is undoutedly in the nature of such discoveries. It is not probable—for he was, I believe, ignorant of the French language—that poor Chatterton, like me, had laboured through all the Ana, and caught the idea from their perusal.

We might be inclined to forgive a skilful forgery of the two books of Cicero on Glory: they must have been very important and curious; for no man was more enthusiastically fond of glory than this orator. Petrarch speaks of them with extasy, and tells us, that he studied them perpetually.

SKETCHES OF CRITICISM.

Yes, should Great Homer lift his aweful head, Zoilus again would start up from the dead!

The greatest authors of antiquity have smarted under the lash of Criticism. Chevrau has collected a great number of inflances.

stances. Lest I should prove tedious, I only select a few.

It was given out, that Homer had stolen from Hesiod whatever was most remarkable in the Iliad and Odyssey. The Emperor Caligula suppressed the works of this great poet: and gave for reason, that he certainly had as much right as Plato, who had so severely condemned him.

Sophocles was brought to trial by his children as a lunatic: and some, who blamed the inequalities of this poet, have also condemned the vanity of Pindar; the hard and rough verses of Æschylus; and the manner in which Euripides conducted his plots.

Socrates, who has even been compared to Jesus Christ, as the wisest and the most moral of men, Cicero has treated as an usurer, and Athenaeus as an illiterate person. Mr. Cumberland, in one of his Observers, has industriously revived a calumny which most assuredly only took it's rise from the malignant bussionery of Aristophanes; who, as Jortin says, was a great wit, but a great rascal. Should some suture author draw his anecdotes from the writings of a Foote, we know well that he might delineate a spirited character; but nothing, at the same time, would be more fictitious.

Plato, who has been called, by Clement of Alexandria, the Moses of Athens; the Philosopher of the Christians, by Arnobius; and the God of Philosophers, by Cicero; has undergone a variety of criticisms. Athenæus accuses him of envy; Theopompus, of lying; Suidas, of avarice; Aulus Gellius, of robbery; Porphyry, of incontinence; and Aristophanes, of impiety.

Aristotle, who, according to some writers, has composed more than sour hundred volumes, and who for his work on animals received from Alexander eight hundred talents, has not been less spared by the critics. Diogenes Laertius, Cicero, and Plutarch, have forgotten nothing that can tend to shew his ignorance, his ambition, and his vanity.

If the reader does not feel himself weary, he may read on.

Virgil is destitute of invention, if we are to give credit to Pliny, Carbilius, and Seneca. Caligula has absolutely denied him even mediocrity; Herennus has marked his faults; faults; and Perilius Faustinus has furnished a thick volume with his plagiarisms. Even the author of his Apology has confessed, that he has stolen from Homer his greatest beauties.

Horace censures the coarse humour of Plautus; and Horace, in his turn, has been blamed for siction and obscurity.

The majority of the critics regard Pliny's History only as a pleasing romance; and feem to have quite as little respect for Quintus Curtius.

Pliny cannot bear Diodorus and Vopifcus; and, in one comprehensive criticism, treats all the historians as narrators of fables.

Livy has been reproached for his aversion to the Gauls; Dion, for his hatred of the Republic; Velleius Paterculus, for speaking too kindly of the vices of Tiberius; and Herodotus and Plutarch, for their excessive partiality to their own country. Others have said of Cicero, that there is no connection, and, to adopt their own figure, no blood and nerves, in what his admirers so warmly extol. They say, he is cold in his extemporaneous essuable for his day, he is cold in his his exordiums trisling in his strained witticisms, and tiresome in his digressions.

Quintilian does not spare Seneca; and Demosthenes, called by Cicero the Prince of Orators, has, according to Hermippus, more of art than of nature. To Demades, his orations appear too much laboured; others have thought him too dry; and, if we may trust Eschines, his language is by no means pure.

Should we proceed with this list to our own country, and our own times, it might be curiously augmented; but, perhaps, enough has been said, to soothe irritated genius, and to shame fastidious criticism. ' I would beg the critics to remember,' the Earl of Roscommon writes, in his Preface to his Version of Horace's Art of Poetry, ' that Horace owed his favour and his fortune to the character given of him by Vir-' gil and Varius; that Fundanius and Pollio ' are still valued by what Horace says of them; and that, in their Golden Age, there was a good understanding among the ' ingenious, and those who were the most f esteemed were the best-natured.' I would hope, in spite of the daily cries we hear from from disappointed writers, that those journalists, whose style and sentiments render them respectable in the eyes of every man of letters, maintain with rigid integrity the fountains of criticism pure and incorrupt. They cannot be insensible that their volumes are not merely read, and then forgotten; but that they will remain as surviving witnesses, for or against them, from century to century.

- Be thou the first true merit to befriend;
- * His praise is lost, who waits till ALL commend."

THE PERSECUTED LEARNED.

IT will be sufficient to name that greatest of men, Socrates; his intelligence and his virtue were punished with death. goras, when he attempted to propagate a just notion of the Supreme Power, was dragged to prison. The celebrated Aristotle, after a long series of persecution, swallowed poison. Heraclitus, tormented by his countrymen, broke off all intercourse with men. C 4

Gerbert,

Gerbert, in the tenth century, was a great geometrician and chymist, but was detested as a magician. Ramus, a great scholar of the sixteenth century, was condemed as a state criminal, because he combated the notions of Aristotle: he was assassinated by his enemies.

For all these instances I am indebted to Mr. Thomas, in his notes on the Eloge of Descartes.

Virgilius, Bishop of Saltsburg, having written, that there existed Antipodes; Bonisace, Archbishop of Mayence, the Pope's Legate, declared him a heretic, and consigned him to the flames.

Galileo, because he believed in the Copernican System, now universally established, was condemned at Rome publicly to disavow sentiments, the truth of which must have been to him abundantly manifest.

The most valued of Gabriel Naudess, works, is his Apology for those great men who have been accused of Magic. In that book he has recorded a melancholy number of the most eminent scholars, who have found, that to have been successful in their studies, was a success which harrassed them with

with a continued perfecution, that sometimes led them into the prison, and sometimes bound them to the stake.

Urban Grandier, for whose life, replete with interesting anecdote, I refer the reader to Bayle, was burnt alive, through the machinations of a rival, who formed a conspiracy against this amiable and unfortunate scholar, by contriving to get the depositions of some nuns to prove the crime of magic. These women must have been guilty of the most horrid perjuries.

Cornelius Agrippa was necessitated to fly his country, and the enjoyments of a rich income, merely for having displayed a few philosophical experiments, which now every school-boy can perform. The people beheld him as an object of horror; and not infrequently, when he walked the streets, he found them empty at his approach. He died, of difease and famine, in an hospital.

In these times, it was a common opinion. to suspect every great man of an intercourse with some familiar spirit. The favourite. black dog of Agrippa was supposed to be a Demon. When Urban Grandier was led. so the stake, a large sly settled on his head:

a Monk, who had heard that Beelzebub signifies in Hebrew the God of Flies, reported that he saw this spirit come to take possession of him. Mr. De Langear, a French minister, who employed many spies, was frequently accused of a diabolical communication. Sixtus the Fifth, Marechal Faber, Roger Bacon, Cæsar Borgia, his son Alexander VI. and others, like Socrates, had their diabolical attendant.

Cardan was believed to be a magician. The fact is, that he was for his time a very able naturalist; and he who happened to know something of the arcana of nature was immediately suspected of magic.

Petrarch was less desirous of the laurel for the honour, than for the hope of being sheltered by it from the thunders of priests, by whom both he and his brother poets were continually threatened. They could not imagine a poet, without supposing him to hold an intercourse with some Demon. This was, as Abbe Resnel observes in a Memoir of the French Academy, having a most exalted idea of poetry, though a very bad one of poets. A certain Dominican was samous for persecuting all those who dared to make verses; and the power of which he attributed to the effects of berefy and magic.

The great Descartes was horridly persecuted in Holland, when he first published his opinions to the world. Voetius, a bigot of great power at Utrecht, accused him of atheism; and had even projected in his mind to have him condemned without allowing him to make his defence, and to have him burnt at Utrecht in an extraordinary fire, which, kindled on an eminence, might be observed by all the provinces!

In the present day, when the lights of philosophy have become so generally expanded, we perceive the little soundation of all these accusations of magic. What a dreadful chain must there have been of perjuries and conspiracies! One is willing to imagine, for the honour of human nature, that so deep a malignity, and so set date a cruelty, could not have tainted the heart of man; but the simple recital of history forms, too often, the severest satire on human nature.

Our great Roger Bacon, by a degree of penetration penetration which perhaps has never been equalled, discovered some of the most occult secrets in Nature. She seems, indeed—if I may so express myself—to have stood naked before him. His honours have been stolen from him by more modern authors, who have appeared inventors when they were copying Bacon. Yet, for the reward of all his intense studies, the holy brethren, and the infallible Majesty of Rome, occafioned him to languish in prison during the greater part of his life.

The catalogue of the Persecuted Learned is indeed voluminous. We need not waste our tears on sictitious sorrows, while the remembrance of these men shall exist!

THE POVERTY OF THE LEARNED.

FORTUNE has rarely condescended to be the companion of Merit. Even in these enlightened times, men of letters have lived in obscurity, while their reputation was widely spread; and have perished in poverty, while their works were enriching the bookfellers.

Homer, poor and blind, resorted to the public places to recite his verses for a morfel of bread.

The facetious poet, Plautus, gained a livelihood by affifting a miller.

Xylander sold his Notes on Dion Cassius for a dinner. He tells us, that at the age of eighteen he studied to acquire glory, but at twenty-five he studied to get bread.

Aldus Manutius was so wretchedly poor, that the expence of removing his library from Venice to Rome made him insolvent.

To mention those who left nothing behind them to satisfy the undertaker, were an endless task.

Agrippa died in a workhouse; Cervantes is supposed to have died with hunger; Camoens was deprived of the necessaries of life, and is believed to have perished in the streets.

The great Tasso was reduced to such a dilemma, that he was obliged to borrow a crown from a friend to subsist through the week. He alludes to his distress in a pretty Sonnet, which he addresses to his Cat, entreating her to assist him, during the night, with the lustre of her eyes—

having no candle by which he could see to write his verses!

Ariosto bitterly complains of poverty in his Satires: when at length the liberality of Alphonso enabled him to build a small house, it was most miserably furnished! When he was told that such a building was not fit for one who had raised so many fine palaces in his writings, he answered, that the structure of words and that of stones was not the same thing. The reader may be pleased to have his own expressions— Che porvi le pietre, e porvi le parole non è il me
" desimo!"

The illustrious Cardinal Bentivoglio, the ornament of Italy and of literature, languished, in his old age, in the most distressful poverty; and, having sold his palace to satisfy his creditors, left nothing behind him but his reputation.

Le Sage resided in a little cottage on the borders of Paris, and while he supplied the world world with their most agreeable Romances, never knew what it was to possess any moderate degree of comfort in pecuniary matters.

Du Ryer, a celebrated French poet, was constrained to labour with rapidity, and to live in the cottage of an obscure village. His bookseller bought his Heroic Verses for one hundred sols the hundred lines, and the smaller ones for fifty sols.

Vaugelas, the most polished writer of the French language, whose life was passed in giving it all it's perfection, and who, it is said, devoted thirty years to his translation of Quintus Curtius, (a circumstance that modern translators can have no conception of) possessed nothing valuable but his precious manuscripts.

It is recorded of this ingenious scholar, that he lest his corpse to the surgeons, for the benefit of his creditors.

Louis the Fourteenth honoured Racine and Boileau with a private monthly audience. One day, the king asked what there was new in the literary world? Racine answered, that he had seen a melancholy spectacle spectacle in the house of Corneille, whom he found dying, deprived even of a little broth! The king preserved a prosound silence: and soon asterwards he sent for the use of the dying man a sum of money.

There are kings who would have imitated Louis in keeping, on this occasion, so profound a silence; and perhaps there is but one, who, like him, would have recollected to relieve the unhappy poet.

Dryden, for less than three hundred pounds, sold Tonson ten thousand verses, as may be seen by the agreement which has been published.

Purchas, who, in the reign of our First James, had spent his life in travels and study to form his Relation of the World; when he gave it to the public, for the reward of his labours was thrown into prison, at the suit of his printer. Yet this was the book which, he informs us in his Dedication to Charles the First, his father read every night with great profit and satisfaction.

John Stow quitted the occupation of a taylor for that of an antiquary; but his fludies placing him in embarrassed circumstances, stances, he acted wisely in resuming the shears. Afterwards he was so fortunate as to insect a patron in Archbishop Parker.

It appears by the Harleian MS. 7524, that Rushworth, the author of 'Historical' Collections,' passed the last years of his life in jail, where indeed he died. After the Restoration, when he presented to the king several of the privy council's books, which he had preserved from ruin, he received for his only reward, the thanks of his Majesty!

Dr. Dee, in the reigns of Elizabeth and James, the celebrated mathematician; (whole intercourse with invisible spirits the reader may recollect) was a very learned man. After having collected a library of 4000 volumes, and enriched it with mathematical instruments and MSS. and even in possession of a wide reputation, died in extreme poverty.

Rymer, the collector of the Fædera, must have been sadly reduced, by the solitowing letter, addressed by Peter le Noire, Norroy to the Earl of Oxford, preserved in the British Museum—

I am defired by Mr. Rymer, historiographer, to lay before your lordship the circumstances of his affairs. He was forced
Vol. I.

Circum-

' some years back to part with all his choice

' printed books to subsist himself; and now,

' he says, he must be forced, for subsistence, to fell all his MSS. Collections to the best 'bidder, without your lordship will be * pleased to buy them for the queen's library.

'They are fifty volumes, in folio, of public 'affairs, which he hath collected, but not ' printed. The price he asks is five hun'dred pounds.'

Simon Ockley, a most learned scholar in oriental literature, addresses a letter to the same Earl, in which he paints his distresses in colours not less just than they are glowing. After having devoted his life to Asiatic researches, then not less uncommon than they were valuable, he had the satisfaction of dating his presace to his great work from Cambridge Castle, where he was confined for debt; and he does this with an air of triumph, as a martyr seels enthusiasm in the cause for which he perishes.

Spenser—amiable poet!—languished out his life in misery. 'The queen,' says Dr. Granger, 'was far from having a just sense of his merit: and Lord Burleigh, who prevented her giving him a hundred pounds, seems to have thought the lowest clerk in his office a more deserving person. He died in want of bread. Mr. Malone has lately shewn that Spenser had a small pension, but his information has more of ingenuity than certainty.

Savage, in the pressing hour of distress, fold that eccentric poem, The Wanderer, which had occupied him several years, for ten pounds.

Even our great Milton, as every one knows, fold his immortal work for ten pounds to a bookseller, being too poor to undertake the printing it on his own account; and Otway, and Butler, and Chatterton, it is sufficient to name. The latter, while he supplied a variety of monthly Magazines with their chief materials, found a penny tart a luxury; and a luxury it was to him who could not always get bread to his water.

Samuel Boyce, whose poem on Creation ranks high in the poetic scale, was absolutely famished to death; and was found dead in a garret, with a blanket thrown over his shoulders, fastened by a skewer, with a pen in his hand!

Who shall pursue important labours when they read these anecdotes? Dr. Granger relates of Dr. Edmund Castle, that a great part of his life was spent in compiling his Lexicon Heptaglotton, on which he bestowed incredible pains, and expended on it no less than 12,000l. and broke his constitution, and exhausted his fortune. At length it was printed, but the copies remained unsold on his hands.

On this subject what an admirable observation has Bayle made. After having informed us, that the wife and the daughter of Drusius, an eminent scholar, were left destitute, and hardly subsisted by the casual contributions of a few friends, he exclaims,

- What a pity is it, that the only daughter
- of such an author should have been re-
- duced to this great misery, while the poste-
- rity of so many fools display such splendid
- equipages l'

I wish every man of letters could apply to himself the concluding lines of this beautiful tiful epitaph, which a friend of Le Sage composed for this ingenious writer.

> Sous-ce tombeau git LE SAGE abattu Par le ciseau de la Parque importune; S'il ne sut pas ami de la fortune, Il sut toujours ami de la vertu.

Beneath this temb Le Sags has found repose,
Who well the gay and serious powers could blend;
Tho' not of FORTUNE'S FRIENDS, he gave his vows
To other hopes, and still was VIRTUR'S FRIEND.

In a book, entitled De Infortunio Litter ratorum, may be found many other examples of the miseries of literary men.

THE IMPRISONMENT OF THE LEARNED.

IMPRISONMENT seems not much to have disturbed the man of letters in the progress of his studies.

It was in prison that Boethius composed his excellent book on the Consolations of Philosophy.

D 3 Buchanan,

Buchanan, in the dungeon of a monastery in Portugal, composed his excellent Paraphrases of the Psalms of David.

Pelisson, during five years confinement for some state affairs, pursued with ardour his studies in the Greek language, in Philosophy, and particularly in Theology; and produced several good compositions.

Michael Cervantes composed the best and most agreeable book in the Spanish language during his captivity in Barbary.

Fleta, a well known and very excellent little law production, was written by a perfon confined in the Fleet prison for debt, but whose name has not been preserved.

There is another work which derives its title from the Fleet-prison. It is Fleta Minor, or the Laws of Art and Nature in knowing the Bodies of Metals, &c. It is written by Sir John Pettus, in folio, 1683. He gave it this title because he translated it from the German during his confinement in this prison.

Louis the Twelfth, when he was Duke of Orleans, being taken prisoner at the battle of St. Aubin, was long confined in the Tower of Bourges; and applying himself to his studies, which he had hitherto neglected, he became in consequence an able and enlightened monarch.

Margaret, queen of Henry the Fourth, king of France, confined in the Louvre, pursued very warmly the studies of elegant literature, and composed a very skilful Apology for the irregularities of her conduct.

Charles the First, during his cruel confinement at Holmsby, wrote that excellent book, entitled The Portrait of a King; which he addressed to his son, and where the political reflections will be found not neworthy of Tacitus. This work has, however, been attributed by his enemies to Dr. Gawden, who was incapable of writing a fingle paragraph of it. In Mr. Nichols's Life of Bowyer, the reader will find an accurate statement of this disputable point; which, however, will not now admit of dispute amongst the candid and the judicious. Gawden wrote any thing, it could only have been the affected title, which is in his own vitious style. The penetrating Hume, and the acute Smollet, make no difficulty of giving this work to the Royal author; yet a writer (a Puritan possibly) honoured me with D 4 with his copious abuse, because I wrote what I believed.

Queen Elizabeth, while confined by her fifter Mary, wrote some very charming poems, which we do not find she ever could equal after her enlargement: and Mary, Queen of Scots, during her long imprisonment by Elizabeth, produced many pleasing poetic compositions.

Sir Walter Ralegh—according to his own orthography—produced, in his confinement, his History of the World. Of him it is observed, to employ the language of Hume, they had leisure to reflect on the hard-! ship, not to say the injustice, of his sen-! tence. They pitied his active and enf terprizing spirit, which languished in the f rigours of confinement. They were Aruck with the extensive genius of the man, who, being educated amidst naval and military s enterprizes, had surpassed, in the pursuits f of literature, even those of the most recluse and sedentary lives; and they adf mired his unbroken magnanimity which, at his age, and under his circumstances, could engage him to undertake and execute so great a work as his History of the World.

The plan of the Henriade was sketched, and the greater part composed, by Voltaire, during his imprisonment in the Bastile.

Howel, the author of Familiar Letters, &c. wrote the chief part of them, and almost all his other works, during his long confinement in the Fleet-prison; some say for debts which his irregular living had occasioned, and others, for political reasons. This is certain, that he used his pen for subsistence in that imprisonment, and there produced one of the most agreeable works in the English language.

Cardinal Polignac formed the design of refuting the arguments of the Sceptics which Bayle had been renewing in his Dictionary; but his public occupations hindered him. Two exiles at length fortunately gave him the leifure; and the Anti-Lucretius is the fruit of the court disgraces of its author.

Freret, when imprisoned in the Bastile, was permitted only to have Bayle for his companion. He got his Dictionary almost by heart, and likewise his principles. It was from this circumstance that he formed himfelf in his school, and has attacked religion in his works, with all the powers of Scepticism, while others say, of Atheism.

Sir William Davenant finished his poem of Gondibert during his confinement by the rebels in Carisbroke Castle.

De Foe, when imprisoned in Newgate for a political pamphlet, began his Review; a periodical paper, which was extended to nine thick volumes in quarto, and was, says Mr. Chalmers, the model of the celebrated papers of Steele. He also composed there the greatest part of his Jure Divino.

Wicquefort's curious work on ambassadors, I observe is dated from his prison, where he had been confined for state affairs. He softened the rigour of those heavy hours by several historical works.

AMUSEMENTS OF THE LEARNED.

Men of letters, for a relaxation from literary fatigue—a fatigue which is more unfufferable than that which proceeds from the labours of the mechanic—form amusements, sometimes, according to their professional character; but more frequently according to their whim.

Tycho Brahe diverted himself with polishing Mining glasses for all kinds of spectacles, and making mathematical instruments.

D'Andilly, the translator of Josephus, one of the most learned men of his age, after seven or eight hours of study every day, amused himself in cultivating trees; Barellay, in his leisure hours, was a storist; Balzac amused himself with making pastils; Peirese sound his amusement amongst his medals and antiquarian curiosities; the Abbé de Maroles with his engravings; and Politian in singing airs to his lute.

Conrad ab Uffenbach, who was one of the most learned scholars of Germany, recreated his mind, after severe studies, with a collection of prints of eminent persons, methodically arranged. The passion of collecting portraits he retained to the time of his death. Such a collection refreshes the memory, and kindles the imagination.

Rohault wandered from shop to shop to observe the mechanics labour.

The great Arnauld read, in his hours of relaxation, any amusing romance that sell into his hands. This also did the critical Warburton.

Galileo read Ariosto; and Christina, queen of Sweden, Martial and other Latin authors.

authors. Not a day passed but she read a portion of Tacitus. This author, difficult to the learned, was familiar to her. She confessed, however, that his works were rather one of her serious readings than her amusing ones.

Guy Patin wrote letters to his friends: an usual relaxation amongst men of letters, and very agreeable to their correspondents, when they are worth the postage.

Others have found amusement in composing treatises on odd subjects. Seneca wrote a Burlesque Narrative on Claudian's Death. Pierrius has written an Eulogium on Beards.

Virgil sported prettily with a gnat; Homer with frogs and mice.

Holstein has written an Eulogium on the North Wind; Heinsius, on the Ass; Menage, the Transmigration of the Parasitical Pedant to a Parrot; and also the Petition of the Dictionaries.

Erasmus composed—I think it was to amuse himself when travelling in a post-chaise—his Panegyric on Moria, or Folly; which, authorized by the pun, he dedicated to Sir Thomas More.

Sallengre

Sallengre, who would amuse himself like Erasmus, wrote, in imitation of his work, a panegyric on Ebriety; and it is for this reason that he says, in his preface, that he is willing to be thought as drunken a man as Erasmus was a soolish one. When it was translated into the Dutch language, many Germans were offended.

Synesius composed a Greek panegyric on Baldness, which, Warton observes, was brought into great vogue by Erasmus's Moriæ Encomium.

It seems (Johnson observes in his Life of Sir Thomas Browne) to have been in all ages the pride of Art to shew how it could exalt the low, and amplify the little. To this ambition perhaps we owe the frogs of Homer; the Gnat and the Bees of Virgil; the Buttersly of Spenser; the Shadow of Wowerus; and the Quincunx of Browne.

Montaigne found a very agreeable playmate in his cat.

Cardinal de Richelieu, amongst all his great occupations, sound a recreation in violent exercises; and he was once discovered jumping with his servant, to try who could reach the highest side of a wall. De Grammont, Grammont, observing the cardinal to be jealous of his powers in this respect, offered to jump with him; and, in the true spirit of a courtier, having made some efforts which nearly reached the cardinal's, confessed he was surpassed by him. This was jumping like a politician; and it was by this means, it is said, he ingratiated himself with the minister.

Dr. Samuel Clarke was fond of robust exercise; and the scholar has been found leaping over tables and chairs.

What ridiculous amusements passed between Dean Swift and his friends, in Ireland, his discerning editors have kindly revealed to the public. We are astonished to see a great mind suffering itself to be levelled to tristes which even our very Magazines consider as disgraceful to their pages!

The life of Shenstone was passed in an amusement which was to him an eternal source of disappointment and anguish. His favourite ferme ornée, while it displayed all the taste and elegancies of the Poet, displayed also his characteristic poverty. His feeling mind was often pained by those invidious comparisons which the vulgar were perpetually petually making with the stately scenes of Hagley's neighbouring magnificence.

If Dr. Johnson suffered his great mind to descend into trivial amusements, it was—to borrow the image of a friend—like the elephant, who sometimes gives a shock to armies, and sometimes permits himself to be led by a naked infant.

The amusements of the great Daguesseau, Chancellor of France, consisted in the severest studies: in a word, all his relaxations were only changes of labour. In the age of the passions, says Thomas, his only passion was study.

The same writer observes, The great

- · Leibnitz, historian, lawyer, philosopher,
- and sublime geometrician, after having met
- · Newton in the paths of Infinity, came
- fometimes amongst the Muses to reanimate
- his genius, and unbend it's springs.'

THE REPUBLIC OF LETTERS.

In the present article I am little more than the translator of the lively and ingenious Vigneul Marville.

The Republic of Letters is of an ancient date. It appears by the pillars Josephus has noticed, on which were engraven the principles of the sciences, that this republic existed before the Deluge; at least, it cannot be denied that, soon after this great catastrophe, the sciences flourished.

Never was a republic greater, better peopled, more free, or more glorious: it is spread on the face of the earth, and is composed of persons of every nation, of every rank, of every age, and of both sexes. They are intimately acquainted with every language, the dead as well as the living. To the cultivation of letters they join that of the arts; and mechanics are also permitted to occupy a place. But their religion cannot boast of uniformity; and their manners, like those of every other republic, form a mixture of good and of evil: they are fometimes enthusiastically pious, and sometimes insanely impious.

The politics of this state consist rather in words, in vague maxims and ingenious reflections, than in actions, or their effects. This people owe all their strength to the brilliancy of their eloquence, and the solidity of their arguments. Their trade is perfectly intellectual, and their riches very moderate; they live in one continued strifts for glory, and for immortality. Their dress is by no means splendid; yet they affect to despite those who labour through the impulse of avarice or necessity.

They are divided into many sects, and they seem to multiply every day. The state is shared between the Philosophers, the Physicians, the Divines, the Lawyers, the Historians, the Mathematicians, the Orators, the Grammarians, and the Poets, who have each their respective laws.

Justice is administered by the Critics, frequently, with more severity than justice. The people groan under the tyranny of these governors, particularly when they are capricious and visionary. They rescind, they Yor. I.

erase, or add, at their will and pleasure, much in the manner of the Grand Monarque—Car tel est notre plaisir; and no author can answer for his fate, when once he is fairly in their hands. Some of these are so unfortunate, that, through the cruelty of the treatment they receive, they lose not only their temper, but their sense and wits.

Shame is the great castigation of the guilty; and to lose one's reputation, among this people, is to lose one's life. There exist, however, but too many impudent swindlers, who prey upon the property of others; and many a vile spunger, who snatches the bread from the hands of men of merit.

The public are the distributors of glory; but, too often, the distribution is made with blindness, or undiscerning precipitation. It is this which causes loud complaints, and excites such murmurs throughout the republic.

The predominating vices of this state are presumption, vanity, pride, jealou'v, and calumny. There is also a distemper peculiar to the inhabitants, which is denominated bunger, bunger, and which occasions frequent desolations throughout the country.

This republic, too, has the misfortune to be infected with numerous Plagiarists; a species of banditti who rise the passengers. The corrupters of books, and the forgers, are not less formidable; nor do there want impostors, who form rhapsodies and bestow pompous titles on unimportant trises, who levy heavy contributions on the public.

There are also found an infinite number of illustrious Idlers and Voluptuaries; who, only seeking for those volumes that afford amusement, draw all their subsistence from the state, without contributing any thing either to it's advantage or it's glory. There are also Misanthropes, born with an hatred of men: Pedants, who are the terror of school-boys, and the enemies of urbanity and amiable manners.

I will not notice the licentious Geniuses of the republic, who are in an eternal hostility of sentiments, and a warfare of disputes; nor those fastidious minds, who are too delicate not to be offended every moment; nor those Visionaries, who load their imagination with crude and false systems.

E 2 All

All these may be supposed to exist in a republic so vast as that of Letters; where it is permitted to every one to reside, and to live according to his own inclinations.

THE PORTRAITS OF ANCIENT AUTHORS.

WITH the ancients, it was undoubtedly a custom to place the portraits of Authors before their works. Martial will ferve as a testimony in this case. The hundred and eighty-sixth Epigram of his fourteenth Book -is a mere play on words, concerning a little volume which contained the works of Virgil, and which had his portrait prefixed to it. The volume and the characters must have been very diminutive. Antiquity records many such penmen, whose glory consisted in writing in so small a hand, that it. was not legible to the naked eye. One wrote a verse of Homer on a grain of mil-Jet; and another, more trifling and indefacigable, transcribed the whole Iliad in so confined a space, that it could be inclosed in a nut shell. Menage says, that these things things are not so improbable as they seem. This trifling art is not lost in modern times. He says, he has read whole sentences which were not perceptible to the eye without the assistance of the microscope. He has even seen portraits and pictures of the same kind; and, which feems wonderful, what appeared lines and scratches thrown down at random, were letters in capitals: and the lineaments of Madame la Dauphine's face were preserved with the most pleasing delicacy, and with correctness of resemblance. He read also an Italian poem, in praise of this princess, which contained some thousands of verses; [I transcribe his words.] It was written, by an officer, in a space of a foot and a half.

There is preserved in the British Museum, a drawing representing the portrait of Queen Anne; it is not much above the size of the band. On this drawing appear a number of lines and scratches, which, the librarian assures the wondering spectator, includes the entire contents of a thin folio, which, on this occasion, he always carries in his hand. It answers exactly to the above-mentioned piece.

E 3 Martial

Martial is not the only writer who takes notice of the ancients prefixing their portraits to their works. Seneca, in his ninth chapter on the Tranquillity of the Soul, complains of many of the luxurious great, who—like so many of our own—possessed libraries as they did their estates and equipages.

- It is melancholy to observe, he continues,
- ' how the portraits of men of genius, and
- the works of their divine intelligence, but
- ferve as the luxury and the ornaments of their walls.'

Pliny has nearly the same observation, Lib. xxxv. cap. 2. he remarks, that the custom was rather modern in his time; and attributes to Asinius Pollio the honour of having introduced it into Rome. 'In confecrating,' he says, 'a library with the por-

- carries of our illustrations and the same bases
- ' traits of our illustrious authors, you have
- formed, if I may so express myself, a re-
- · public of the intellectual powers of men.'

Amongst the various advantages which attend a collection of the portraits of illustrious characters, are these. Mr. Oldys says, that they not only serve as matters of entertainment and curiosity, and preserve the different modes or habits of the fashions of the time, but that they become of infinite importance, by settling our floating ideas upon the true features of famous persons; that they fix the chronological particulars of their birth, age, death, &c. and the short characters of them, besides the names of painter, designer, and engraver. It is thus a single print, by the hand of a skilful artist, may become a rich and plenteous banquet. To this Dr. Granger adds, that in a collection of engraved portraits, the contents of many galleries are reduced into the narrow compass of a few volumes; and . the portraits of eminent persons who distinguished themselves, for a long succession of ages, may be turned over in a few hours.

'Another advantage,' he continues, 'attending such an assemblage is, that the methodical arrangement has a surprizing effect upon the memory. We see the celebrated contemporaries of every age almost at one view; and the mind is insensibly led to the history of that period. I may add to these, an important circumstance, which is, the power that such a collection will have in awakening Genius. A skilful preceptor will presently perceive the true

- bent of the temper of his pupil, by his be-
- ing struck with a Blake or a Boyle, a Hyde
- or a Milton.'

How rarely are portraits to be depended on; Goldsmith was a short thick man, with wan features and a vulgar appearance, but looks very fashionable in an elegant wig, &c. Bayle's portrait does not resemble him, as I have read.—One of Rousseau's, in his Montero cap, was not like him. Shakespeare's portrait was drawn from that of another person.

TARTARIAN LIBRARIES.

has the following curious article of intelligence: 'In that part of Tartary which be'longs to the kingdom of Persia, there ex'ists a flourishing university, where the Arabs
'cultivate literature. Gioan Baptista Re'mondi, who was the first who caused books
'in the Arabic language to be printed in Eu'rope, and who had even studied in this uni'versity, has pretended to say, that there 'were

- were a number of Arabic books translated
- from many Greek authors who remain un-
- * known to the Europeans. It was the Ara-
- bians who preserved a book of Archi-
- medes: with many authors who have writ-
- ten on mathematics; as well as Apollonius
- Pergeæus, and even Aristotle, Hippocrates,
- and Galen.'

To this account may be added that which Bell has given us in his Travels to Tartary. It is—' That in Siberia there exists an un-

- * common library, the rooms of which are
  - filled with scrolls of glazed paper, fairly
  - wrote, and many of them in gilt characters.
  - · The language in which they are written is - ' that of the Tongusts, or Calmucs. Per- haps, he adds, they may contain some
  - 'valuable pieces of antiquity, particularly ancient history.'

At Mount Athos, Mr. Andrews, in his Anecdotes, informs us, 'That travellers 'agree there are several monasteries with 'libraries full of books, which are illegible 'to those holy brotherhoods, but whose contents are probably well worth inspection.'

Every captain, who can write his own log-book, has of late obtruded his discove-

pened to observe, and worked up into pathos his account of storms and short provisions. If these literary navigators would, in their voyages, endeavour to bring some information, or some materials of this kind, to Europe, a new source of knowledge would be opened to our contemplation; many books, which are now lost, might probably be recovered; Science might be enlarged, and Amusement gratisted.

THE BIBLIOMANIA.

Should ever the idea thrown out in the preceding article be put in practice, the learned must be careful, in their zeal, of not becoming the dupes of the artful illiterate. The present anecdote may serve as a beacon.

The Bibliomania, or the collecting an enormous heap of books, has long been the rage with some who would fain pass themselves upon us for men of vast erudition.

Some, indulging this luxury of literature,

desirous of forming an immense and curious library, have scoured all Europe, and fent out travellers to the Indies to discover ancient books, or scarce manuscripts. This has occasioned many cheats and impositions. Towards the end of the last century, some ignorant or knavish men sent to Paris a number of Arabic manuscripts, in excellent condition and clear characters. were received with all imaginable respect by the eager collectors of books; they were rapidly purchased at a high price: but, lo! when they were examined by the connoisseurs, these manuscripts, which were held so inestimable, were discovered to be books of accounts and registers, cleanly transcribed by certain Arabian merchants.—Risum teneatis, Amici!

A fimilar imposition was practised on the great Peiresc. It was reported, that the Ethiopians were in possession of a book written by Enoch. Many literation Europe had long ardently desired to inspect it, as they imagined it would contain many valuable secrets and unknown histories. Upon this, some impostor having got an Ethiopic book into his hands, he wrote for the title, the Prophecies and History of Enoch, upon the front page. M. Peiresc no sooner heard of it, than he purchased it of the impostor for a considerable sum of money. Being afterwards placed in Cardinal Mazarine's library, there Ludolf, famous for his skill in Ethiopic literature, had access to it; when, lo! this History of Enoch was discovered to be nothing more than a Gnostic Treatise upon the Mysteries of Heaven and Earth, but which did not mention one word concerning Enoch.

Another instance is furnished by the Rev. Mr. Granger. Having mentioned Edward Seymour, Duke of Somerset, who deseated the Scots at the memorable battle of Musselburgh, (an overthrow so fatal they could never recover it) he gives us this anecdote—

'There is a very scarce pamphlet of his expedition into Scotland, which hath been fold for four guineas, though the whole of

'it is printed in Hollinshed. I mention

' this as an instance of literary insanity.'

The family of the Fuggers had long accumulated an inestimable collection of books. Wolfius, Bayle informs us, has written written some Greek verses on this celebrated library. He there tells us, that this Bibliotheque was furnished with as many books as there were stars in the heavens; and that it was a Literary Garden, in which he passed entire days in gathering fruits and flowers, in amusing and instructing himself. This passion, when hereditary in illustrious families, ceases to be a mania; it then claims our admiration and our love.

THE DESTRUCTION OF BOOKS.

It is remarkable that conquerors, in the moment of victory, or in the unsparing devastation of their rage, have not been satisfied with destroying men, but have even carried their vengeance to books.

The Romans burnt the books of the Jews, of the Christians, and the Philosophers: the Jews burnt the books of the Christians and the Pagans; and the Christians burnt the books of the Pagans and the Jews.

The greater part of the books of Origen, and and the other Heretics, were continually burnt by the Orthodox party.

Cardinal Ximenes, at the taking of Grenada, condemned to the flames five thousand Alcorans.

The Puritans burnt every thing they found which bore the vestige of Popish origin. We have on record many curious accounts of their holy depredations; of their maiming images, and erasing pictures. The heroic expeditions of one Dowsing, a fanatic Quixote are well known. Cromwell zealously set fire to the library at Oxford, which was the most curious in Europe.

The most violent persecution which ever the Republic of Letters has undergone, is that of the Caliph Omar. After having it proclaimed throughout the kingdom, that the Alcoran contained every thing which was useful to believe and to know, he caused to be gathered together whatever books could be found in his wide realms, and distributed tributed them to the owners of the baths, to be used in heating their stoves; and it is said that they employed no other materials for this purpose during a period of six months!

At the death of the learned Peiresc, it is said in the Menagiana, a chamber in his house, filled with letters from the most eminent scholars of the age, was discovered. Such was the disposition of his niece, who inherited his estates, that, although repeatedly entreated to permit them to be published, she preferred employing them to other purposes; and it was her singular pleasure to regale herself occasionally with burning these learned epistles, to save the expence of firing!

I observe since this anecdote has been printed, that Johnson notices it in one of the Idlers. However, the Earl of Buchan has lately informed the learned world that many of these Letters have been preserved; and that he has projected their publication.

Even the civilization of the eighteenth century could not preserve from the savage and destructive sury of a disorderly mob, in the most polished city of Europe, the valuable able papers of the Earl of Mansfield, which were madly configned to the flames during the difgraceful riots of June 1780.

In the year 1599, (Warton writes) the hall of the stationers underwent as great a purgation as was carried on in Don Quixote's library. He gives a list of the best writers who were ordered for immediate conflagration, by the prelates Whitgift and Bancroft. Like thieves and outlaws, they were ordered to be taken wheresoever they may be found.—' It was also decreed that no Satires or Epigrams should be printed for the future. No plays were to be printed without the inspection and permission of the archbishop of Canterbury and the bishop of London; nor any Englishe Historyes, (I suppose novels and romances) without the fanction of the privy-council. Any pieces of this nature, unlicensed, or now at large and wandering abroad, were to be diligently fought, recalled, and delivered over to the ecclesiastical arm at London-house.'

Menage justly observes, on a friend having had his library destroyed by fire, in which several valuable MSS. had perished, that such a loss is one of the greatest missor-

This gentleman afterwards consoled himself with composing a little treatise, De Bibliothecæ incendio. It must have been sufficiently curious. Even in the present day men of letters are subject to similar missortunes; for though the London Assurance will insure books from fire, I am afraid they will not allow authors to value their own manuscripts.

The sufferings of an author for the loss of his manuscripts is no where so strongly described as in an anecdote of Anthony Urceus. He was one of the most learned and the most unfortunate scholars of the fifteenth century. The loss of his papers feems immediately to have been followed by madness. I shall give the horrid blasphemies he uttered on the occasion. He had prepared an important work for publication; he lived at Forli, and had an apartment in the palace. His room was so dark, that he generally wrote by candle-light. Having gone out, he left the candle burning; the papers were soon kindled, and his library reduced to ashes. As soon as he heard the news, he ran furiously to the Vol. I. palace, E palace, and knocking his head violently against the door, he uttered this blasphemous language. 'Jesus Christ, what great crime have I done! who of those who believed in you, have I ever treated so cruelly? Hear what I am faying, for I am in earnest, and am resolved. If by chance I should be so weak as to address myself to you at the point of death, don't hear me, for I will not be with you, but prefer hell and its eternity of torments.' (To which by the bye he gave no credit.) Those who heard these ravings, tried to console him, but they could not. He quitted the town, and lived franticly, wandering about the woods!

Castelvetro, the Italian Commentator on Aristotle, having heard that his house was on fire, ran through the streets exclaiming to the people, alla poetica! alla poetica! To the Poetic! He was then writing his commentary on the Poetic of Aristotle.

Several men of letters have been known to have risen from their death-bed, to de-stroy their manuscripts. So solicitous have they been not to venture their posthumous reputation reputation in the hands of undiscerning friends and malignant critics. Marmon-tel relates a pleasing anecdote of Colardeau, a charming versisier, who obtained considerable reputation by his version of Pope's epistle of Eloisa to Abelard, and other poems.

This writer had not yet destroyed what he had written of a translation of Tasso. At the approach of death, he recollected this unfinished labour; he knew that his friends would not have the courage to annihilate one of his works; this was reserved for him. Dying, he raised himself, and as if animated, says Marmontel, by an honourable action, he dragged himself along, and with trembling hands, seized his papers and consumed them in one sacrifice. I recollect another instance of a man of letters, of our own country, who acted the same part. He had passed his life in constant study, and it was observed that he had written feveral folio volumes, which his modest fears would not permit him to expose to the eye even of his critical friends. He promised to leave his labours to posterity; and he seemed sometimes with a glow F 2 glow on his countenance to exult, that they would not be unworthy of their acceptance. At his death his sensibility took the alarm; he had the folios brought to his bed; no one could open them, for they were closely locked. At the fight of his favourite and mysterious labours, he paused; he seemed disturbed in his mind, while he felt at every moment his strength decaying; suddenly he raised his seeble hands as if by an effort of uncommon resolution, burnt his papers, and smiled as the greedy Vulcan swallowed every page. The task exhausted this remaining strength, and he soon afterwards expired. These are instances of what may be called the heroism of authors.

CRITICISM.

EARLY after the re-establishment of letlers, (Huet writes) Criticism formed the chief occupation of those who applied themselves to their cultivation. This was very necessary, after so many ages of ignorance.

They were obliged, if we may fo express ourselves, to disperse the dust, to efface the mouldy spots, and to kill the worms that gnawed and disfigured those manuscripts which had escaped the fury of the Barbarians, and the depredations of Time.

It was thus the art of criticism flourished in all its vigour, and was distinguished by it's useful labours, during two centuries. The supreme degree of erudition, consisted in bringing to light the ancient authors; in the correction of the errors of the scribes through whose hands they had passed, either by collating them with the best copies, or exerting their own judgment and learning to the restoring of those passages which were evidently corrupt. At length, this avocation degenerated into a low and obfcure study, the chief merit of which confifted in the recovery and collation of the best manuscripts. This was the employment of Gruter during his whole life. Those to whom these affistances failed, employed their critical acumen and literature to give the ancient writers in all their purity; but, not infrequently, they difmembered that which before before was entire, and occasioned an infinity of labours to the critics, their successors, who were somewhat more judicious than themselves in restoring the passages to their original state, and in healing those wounds and unmerciful lacerations which they had undergone.

Amongst these latter critics, Casaubon, Salmasius, and Gronovius, are distinguished.

Now that the best authors are no more scarce, but multiplied without end by the invention of printing, verbal criticism, the chief merit of which is to catch syllables, deserves no longer our esteem. Critics of this kind may, not unaptly, be compared to weeders; they eradicate the worthless plants, and leave to more skilful cultivators the art of gathering and distinguishing the more valuable ones.

ON THE PHRASE—'THE LAW AND THE PROPHETS.'

JESUS CHRIST calls the five books of Moses, The Law, because of Deuteronomy; and and the books of the Prophets, or their Prophecies, The Prophets. All the other books are called Holy Writings. Hence the phrase of, 'The Law and the Prophets,' so much used by St. Jerome, and the other fathers of the church, is frequently made use of in their writings.

THE SIX FOLLIES OF SCIENCE.

Nothing is so capable of disordering the intellects as an intense application to one of these six things; the Quadrature of the Circle; the Multiplication of the Cube; the Perpetual Motion; the Philosophical Stone; Magic; and Judicial Astrology. While we are young, we may exercise our imagination on these curious topics, merely to convince us of their impossibility; but it shews a great desect in judgment to be occupied on them in an advanced age. 'It is proper, however,' Fontenelle remarks, * to apply one's felf to these enquiries; because we find, as we proceed, many valuable discoveries of which we were before ignorant."

ignorant.' The same thought Cowley has applied, in an address to his mistress, thus—

Yet I'm resolv'd to search for thee:
The search itself rewards the pains.
So, tho' the chymist his great secret miss,
(For neither it in art or nature is)
Yet things well worth his toil he gains;
And does his charge and labour pay
With good unsought experiments by the way.

The same thought is in Donne. Perhaps Cowley did not suspect, that he was an imitator. What is certain, Fontenelle could not have read either; and perhaps, only struck out the thought by his own resection.

Maupertius, in a little volume of Letters written by him, observes, on the Philosophical Stone, that we cannot prove it is impossible to be attained, but we can easily see the folly of those who employ their time and money in seeking for it. For it's price is too great to counterbalance the little probability of succeeding in it.—Of the Perpetual Motion, he shews the impossibility at least in the sense in which it is generally received.

he says he cannot decide, if this problem is resolvable or not: but he observes, that it is very useless to search for it any more; since we have arrived by approximation to such a point of accuracy, that on a large circle such as the orbit which the earth describes round the sun, the Geometrician will not mistake by the thickness of a hair!

FRIAR BACON,

My zeal for the memory of this illustrious scholar impels me to transcribe, which it will be found I seldom do, from a book that is in every body's hands. From the faithful and laborious Henry, have I collected what follows concerning Roger Bacon—

We cannot but lament that Friar Bacon met with so many discouragements in the pursuit of useful knowledge. If he had lived in better times, or if he had even been permitted to prosecute that course of enquiries and experiments in which he engaged ged after his return from Paris, it is highly probable that the world would have many valuable discoveries that are still unknown.

'An excellent modern writer, Dr. Friend, having enumerated some of Bacon's discoveries, adds—" These are wonderful discoveries for a man to make in so ignorant an age, who had no master to teach him, but struck it all out of his own brain: but it is still more wonderful that such discoveries should lie so long concealed; till, in the next succeeding centuries, other people should start up, and lay claim to those very inventions to which Bacon alone had a right."

Reading glasses, the Camera Obscura, Microscopes, Telescopes, and various other mathematical and astronomical instruments. He discovered a method of performing all the chymical operations that are now in use. He combined the mechanical powers in so wonderful a manner, that it was for this he was accused of magic. His discoveries in medicine were by no means unimportant. That the ingredients of gunpowder, and the art of making it, were well known known to him, is now undeniable: but the bumane philosopher, dreading the consequences of communicating this discovery to the world, transposed the letters of the Latin words which fignify Charcoal, which made the whole obscure. It was done thus-Luru mope can vbre, (carbonum pulvere.) By this means he rendered it difficult to discover this dangerous secret by the perusal of his works: and, at the same time, secured to himself the honour of having known it, by specifying the other ingredients, if it should be discovered by any other person. This accordingly happened after Bacon's death; for, about the beginning of the fourteenth century, one Barthold Schwartz, a German monk and chymist, accidentally discovered gunpowder, as he was pounding salt-petre, sulphur and charcoal, in a mortar, for some other purpose.'

To this we may add, that the Chinese employed gunpowder in their wars; and were familiar with the art of printing, probably, some centuries before we made use of them in Europe.

Though Bacon is mentioned, in this article, ticle, as the inventor of optical glasses, Marville gives a curious piece of information, He says, that 'it is generally known, that James Metius, a Dutchman, invented, in 1609, spectacles and telescopes; and that Galileo, being at Venice, imitated as well as he could a telescope, and astonished the learned Venetians from the tower of St, Mark with this novel invention.' He adds—'But there are few who know that the principles of optics, on which telescopes are formed, are to be found in Euclid, and in the ancient geometricians; and that it is through want of reflection that this wonderful invention, as well as many others, have remained so long concealed in the majesty of Nature, as Pliny expresses it, till chance has drawn them out.'

Voltaire writes, that the excellent secret of affishing the enseebled sight, by means of spectacles, was found out by Alexander Spina, towards the end of the thirteenth century.—The fact is indeed not clear. They were known probably before the thirteenth century—Many rude efforts had been made before the days of Galileo to form telescopes; the invention was known, but he greatly greatly perfected them. Our sublime Milton has perhaps added to the immortality of Galileo, by this beautiful simile taken from his telescope.

As when by night the GLASS

Of GALILEO, less assured, observes

Imagined lands and regions in the moon——

It is proper to remind the reader, that Galileo during his imprisonment was visited by Milton, who tells us, that he was then poor and old!

DESCARTES AND HARVEY.

VIGNEUL Marville, in his Melanges de Literature, Vol. II. page 348, has ventured to publish the following two literary anecdotes.

One Claudian Mamert, who flourished in the fifth century, has composed a treatise on the soul; in which are sound the greater part of those principles which Defeaters made use of to establish his new system. It is also said, that his opinion concerning cerning the souls of brutes is to be found in St. Augustine.'

' It is said, that the religious of St. Vanne's have discovered, in St. Ambrose, the doctrine of the circulation of the blood, which has been thought to be a modern discovery by Harvey.'

I am fearful this anecdote was dictated in the uncharitable spirit of criticism; perhaps, to deprive our great physician of the honour of its discovery.

Since this article has been written, I have found, in a letter addressed to Bayle, the passage alluded to in St. Augustine. The opinion of Descartes on the souls of animals is found in St. Augustine, de quantitate animæ. chap. 30.

' Quod autem tibi visum est non esse animam, incorpore viventis animantis, quamquam videatur absurdum, non tamen doctifsimi homines, quibus id placuit defuerunt, neque nunc arbitror Deesse.'

The passage in Servetus, to which Harvey stands indebted for his great discovery, has been reprinted by Woolston. positively assures us, that Servetus made the

the discovery long before our countryman, who is considered abroad, not as the first who discovered the circulation of the blood, but the first who demonstrated it.

Servetus's book, has for title, 'Christianismi Restitutio.' Sixty years afterwards Harvey clearly demonstrated the circulation of the blood. This, if not a discovery, very much resembles one.

Upon such vague reports little is to be relied. Sometimes when our assiduity has discovered the passages alluded to, they are only found to contain some fancied resemblance; and frequently no resemblance at all. It is thus that Law, the translator of the mystical Behmen, imagined that the great Newton took the first conceptions of his philosophy from the German Cobler's nonsense.

CURIOUS SCHOLASTIC DISQUISITIONS.

Amongst the subjects for the disquisitions of the learned, in the eleventh century, were the following ones; Of the substantial form form of Sounds—Of the Essence of Uni-

The following question was a favourite topic; and, after having been discussed by thousands of the acutest logicians, through the course of a whole century,

With all the rash dexterity of wit, remained unresolved—' When a hog is carried to market with a rope tied about it's neck, which is held at the other end by a man; whether is the hog carried to market by the rope, or by the man?

Menage says, that the scholastic questions were called Questiones Quodlibetica, and they were generally so ridiculous, that we have retained the word Quodlibet, in our vernacular language, to express something ridiculously subtile.

TASTE

Is it in vain to account for the operations of Taste? Is it an unsubstantial form? a shadow, which may be seen, but not grasped? It's mutations, sometimes have been wonderful.

wonderful. I am at a loss to account on what principles the present instance took place. Vigneul Marville supplies me with this anecdote—

Brebeuf, when he was young, felt an enthuliastic inclination for the works of Ho-His friend Gautier, on the contrary was infected with a taste for Lucan. This preserence frequently occasioned disputes. To terminate these endless controversies, it was agreed that each of them should read the favourite poet of his friend; that they should examine with critical acumen, and decree with candour. The consequences are singular. Gautier read Horace, became enamoured of his verses, and never after quitted them: while Brebeuf was so charmed with Lucan, that he grew intoxicated with the Pharsalia; and, in translating this epic, out-lucan'd Lucan himself in his bombastic and tumid verses.

That Gautier should reject Lucan, after a studious perusal of Horace, is not surprizing: the wonder is, how Brebeuf could forget so suddenly the graces and the rules of his master, Horace, to give into Lucan's corrupted taste.

Vol. I.

Mr. Burke, in his elegant Essay on the Sublime and Beautiful, says, that ' what is called Taste, in it's most general acceptation, is not a simple idea, but is partly made up of a perception of the primary pleasures of sense; of the secondary pleasures of the imagination; and of the conclusions of the reasoning faculty concerning the various relations of these, and concerning the human passions, manners, and actions. All these are requisite to form Taste; and the groundwork of all these is the same in the human mind: for, as the senses are the great originals of all our ideas, and consequently of all our pleasures, if they are not uncertain and arbitrary, the whole ground-work of Taste is common to all; and, therefore, there is a sufficient foundation for a conclufive reasoning for these matters.'

In another place he observes—' Sensibility and Judgment, which are the qualities that compose what is commonly called a Taste, vary exceedingly in various people. From a defect in the former of these qualities arises a want of Taste: a weakness in the latter constitutes a wrong or a bad one.'

If this account is just, the sensibility and the

was so lively, and the other so vigorous, when in his youthful days he was attached to Horace, must have undergone a total change when he became studiously sond of Lucan. Yet this is not to be conceived: for it is possible to enlarge and to strengthen our judgment; but, surely, not to eradicate a correct one; at least, when a man is in the vigour of life and health.

Bayle says, in the presace to his Republic of Letters, 'TASTES differ so much, even among the wits, and even among those who pass for the most intelligent connoisseurs, that one should not be surprized, nor be vexed, not to have the approbation of all who are good judges.'

It was in a cloudy hour that Gray gave so harsh a decision on the enchanting Eloisa of Rousseau. Instead of contemplating the sine illusions of the imagination, and the poetic richness of the style, he only examined it on the inferior merit of plot and incident.

Men of a corrected taste frequently err, by not observing the temper of their mind at the moment of their examination of a pro duction of Taste. By contemplating a statue in one point of view, we become insensible to those beautiful exertions, which perhaps the sculptor may have given on the other side. Voltaire defines a good Taste to be the perfection of good sense, and the habit of quick decision in a mind well formed; a habit which exercised in topics of literature, may afterwards be applied to other and higher purposes.
G 2 duction

IMITATORS.

THERE are some writers, and in general they will be found to be pedants, who imagine they can supply by the labours of industry the deficiencies of nature. It is recorded of Paulus Manutius, that he frequently spent a month in writing a single letter. He affected to imitate Cicero. The consequences are, that he has attained to something of the elegance of his style; but he is still destitute of the native graces of a flowing and unaffected composition.

Laurent le Brun, a Jesuit, was a most singular gular instance of such an unhappy imitation. He was a Latin poet, and his subjects were religious. He formed a most extravagant project; he attempted to become a Virgil and an Ovid, by merely imitating the titles of their works. His Christian Virgil consists, like the Pagan Virgil, of Ecloques, Georgics, and of an Epic of twelve books, with this difference, that devotional subjects are substituted for fabulous ones. His Christian Ovid is in the same taste; every thing wears a new face. The Epiftles are pious ones; the Fasti are the six days of the Creation; the Elegies are the Lamentations of Jeremiah; a poem on the Love of God is substituted for the Art of Love; and the history of some Conversions supplies the place of the Metamorphoses!

May not such writers be said to create beautiful forms, without the power of be-stowing on them animation?

CICERO.

'I SHOULD,' says Menage, 'have received a great pleasure to have conversed with G<sub>3</sub> Cicero, Cicero, had I lived in his time. He must have been a man very agreeable in conversation, since even Cæsar carefully collected his Bon Mots. Cicero has boasted of the great actions he has done for his country, because there is no vanity in exulting in the performance of our duties; but he has not boasted that he was the most elequent orator of his age, though he certainly was; because nothing is more disgustful than to exult in our intellectual powers.'

I must consess myself no admirer of the witticisms of Cicero; for, in general, they are but meagre puns, such as these—he said to a Senator who was the son of a taylor, Rem acu tetigisti.' To the son of a cook, Ego quoque tibi jure favebo.' To understand this, we must recollect that the Latin was pronounced differently in the days of Cicero than it is at present. Thus, they pronounced coce and quoque like co-ke, which alludes to the Latin word cocus, cook.

THERE is something original, and very just, in Montaigne's censure of this great man. I transcribe it from Cotton's translation:

tion: a translator who has not ill expressed the peculiarities of his author.

As to Cicero, I am of the common opinion, that (learning excepted) he had no great natural parts. He was a good citizen, of an affable nature, as all fat, heavy men, fuch as he was, usually are; but given to ease, and had a mighty share of vanity and ambition. Neither do I know how to excuse him for thinking his poetry sit to be published. 'Tis no great impersection to make ill verses; but it is an impersection not to be able to judge how unworthy his verses were of the glory of his name. For what concerns his eloquence, that is totally out of comparison, and I believe it will never be equalled.'

PREFACES.

A PREFACE being the porch, or the entrance, to a book, should be perfectly beautiful. It is the elegance of a porch which announces the splendor of an edifice. I have observed, that ordinary readers skip over over these little elaborate compositions. Our fair ladies consider them as so many pages lost, which might better be employed in the addition of a picturesque scene, or a tender letter to their novels. For my part, I always gather amusement from a Preface, be. it aukwardly or skilfully written; for dulness, or impertinence, may raise a laugh for a page or two, though they become insufferable throughout a whole volume. A preface is frequently a superior composition to the work itself; for, long before the days of Johnson, it has been a custom with many authors to solicit for this department of their work the ornamental contribution of a man of genius. A good Preface is as essential to put the reader into good humour, as a good Prologue is to a Play, to soothe the auditors into candour, and even into partiality. The Italians call the Preface La falsa del Libro,; the sauce of the book. Marville says, that if well seasoned it creates an appetite in the reader to devour the book itself. A preface badly composed, frequently revolts the reader's taste, and prejudices him against the work itself. Good authors are not equally fortunate in these little introductions, troductions, some can write books but not prefaces; and others prefaces, but not books.

Authors should be careful to date their Prefaces, as these become leading and useful circumstances in literary history.

THE ANCIENTS AND MODERNS.

FREQUENT and violent disputes have arisen on the subject of the preference which is to be given to the Ancients, or the Moderns. With the Battle of Books, by Swift, the reader is well acquainted. The controversy of Perrault and Boileau makes a considerable figure in French Literature; the last of whom, I think, said that the Ancients had been Moderns, but that it was by no means clear the Moderns would become Ancients. Yet, surely, it had been better if these acrid controversies had never disgraced the Republic of Letters. The advice of Sidonius Appollinaris is excellent: he says, that we should read the Ancients with respect, and the Moderns without envy.

FINE THOUGHTS.

Apuleius calls those Neck-kerchiefs so glassy fine, (may I so express myself?) which, in veiling, discover the beautiful bosom of a woman, ventum textilem; which may be translated, woven air. It is an expression beautifully fanciful.

A Greek poet wrote this inscription for a statue of Niobe—

The Gods, from living, caused me to become stone.

Praxiteles, from stone, has restored me to life.

P. Commire, a pleasing writer of Latin verse, has many elegant descriptions inter-spersed in his fables. He says of the slight of a butterfly, Florem putares nare per liquidum athera.

It FLIES, and seems a flower that floats in air!

Voiture, in addressing Cardinal Richelieu, says—How much more affecting is it to hear one's praises from the mouth of the People, than from that of the Poets!

Cervantes, with an elevation of sentiment, observes, observes, that one of the greate? a lvantages which princes possess above other men, is that of being attended by servants as great as themselves.

Lususque salesque,
Sed lectos pelago, quo Venus orta, sales.

This is written by a modern Latin Poet; but is to be found in Plutarch, in his comparison of Aristophanes and Menander; these are his words. 'In the comedies of Menander there is a natural and divine salt, as if it proceeded from that sea where Venus took her birth.' This beautiful thought, observes Monnoye, has been employed by seven or eight modern writers.

Seneca, amongst many tortured sentiments and trivial points, has frequently a happy thought. This on anger is eminently so—'I wish,' he says, 'that the ferocity of this passion could be spent at it's first appearance, so that it might injure but once: as, in the case of the Bees, whose sting is destroyed for ever at the first puncture it occasions.'

Aristenetus says of a Beauty, that she seemed most beautiful when dressed; yet appeared not less beautiful when undressed.

Of two Beauties he says, 'they yielded to' the Graces only in number.'

Menage has these two terse and pointed lines on the portrait of a lady—

> Ce portrait ressemble à la Belle; Il est insensible comme elle.'

Which a friend has thus imitated—

In this portrait, my Fair, thy resemblance I see;
An insensible charmer it is—just like thee!

A French poet has admirably expressed the instantaneous sympathy of two lovers. A princess is relating to her considence the birth of her passion; and says—

'Et comme un jeune cœur est bientot enslammé, Il me vit, il m'aima, je le vis, je l'aimai.' Soon is the youthful heart by passion mov'd: He saw, and lov'd me—him I saw, and lov'd.

I recollect a similar passage in a Spanish play of Calderon; but it partakes, I think, too much of what Boileau calls 'Le clinquant;' for it is well observed, by the same critic, 'that nothing is beautiful which is false.' The passage I allude to runs thus—

'I saw and I loved her so nearly together, that I do not know if I saw her before I loved her, or loved her before I saw her.'

It was said of Petronius, that he was pura impuritas; impuritas; purely impure. Pura, because of his style; impuritas, because of his ob-scenities.

Quam multa! Quam paucis! is a fine expression, which was employed to characterise a concise style pregnant with meaning.

How exquisitely tender does Tasso, in one verse, describe his Olindo! So much love, and so much modesty, however beautiful they may appear in poetry, the less romantic taste of the modern sine lady may not probably admire—

6 Brama assai, poco spera, nulla chiede.

Which Fairfax has thus given, with his accustomed spirit and sidelity—

Eoved much, hoped little, and desired nought.'

This line is not preserved in the version of Hoole.

It was said of an exquisite portrait, that to judge by the eye it did not want speech; this only could be detected by the ear.

Manca il parlar; di vivo altro non chiedi: Ne manca questo ancor, S'agli occhi credi.

Perrault has very poetically informed us, that the ancients were ignorant of the circulation of the blood—

---Igno-

Lu meandre vivant qui coule dans les veines.

Unknown to them what devious course maintains
The live meander flowing in their veins.

· Piango la sua morte, e la mia vita.

Much I deplore her death, and much my

It has been usual for poets to say, that rivers slow to convey their tributary streams to the sea. This sigure, being a mark of subjection, proved offensive to the patriotic Tasso; and he has ingeniously said of the River Po, because of it's rapidity—

Pare

Che porti guerra, e non tributo al mare.'

See rapid Po to Ocean's empire bring A war, and not a tribute, from his spring!

I would distinguish these pastoral verses for their elegant simplicity: they display—at least, in the original—that amiable, light, and artless style, which should characterise this enchanting, though neglected, branch of peetry—

Avec l'email de nos prairies, Quand on le sçait bien faconner On peut aussi-bien couronner, Qu'avec l'or et les pierreries '

Th'

Th' enamell'd flowers our meads discloss,

If the skill'd shepherd graceful frame,

A crown more precious can compose

Than the bright diamond's costlier slame.

The ensuing translation is by a friend, in which the original thought is almost literally preserved, and the structure of the verse scrupulously adhered to. Alternate rhimes, in our language, will certainly be preserved by a correct English ear—

With flowers th' enamell'd meads unfold,
By skilful hands in chaplets bound,
As nobly may desert be crown'd,
As with rich gems, and burnish'd gold.

EARLY PRINTING.

When first the Art of Printing was discovered, they only made use of one side of a page: they had not yet sound out the expedient of impressing the other. When their editions were intended to be curious, they omitted to print the first letter of a chapter, for which they lest a blank space, that it might be painted or illuminated, at the option of the purchaser. Several ancient cient volumes of these early times have been found, where these letters are wanting, as they neglected to have them painted.

When the Art of Printing was first established, it was the glory of the learned to be correctors of the press to the eminent printers. Physicians, lawyers, and bishops themselves, occupied this department. The printers then added frequently to their names those of the correctors of the press; and editions were then valued according to the abilities of the corrector.

Robert Stephens, one of the early printers, surpassed in correctness those who exercised the same profession. His Treasure of the Latin Tongue is still a valuable work. It is said, that, to render his editions immaculate, he hung up the proofs in public places, and generously recompensed those who were so fortunate as to detect any typographical errors.

Plantin, though a learned man, is more famous as a printer. His printing-office claims our admiration: it was one of the wonders of Europe. This grand building was the chief ornament of the city of Antwerp. Magnificent in it's structure, it prefented fented to the spectator an infinite number of presses, characters of all sigures and all sizes, matrixes to cast letters, and all other printing materials; which Baillet assures us amounted to immense sums.

In Italy, the three Manutii were more solicitous of correctness and illustrations, than of the beauty of their printing. It was the character of the scholar, not of the printer, of which they were ambitious.

So valuable an union of learning and printing did not, unfortunately, last. The printers of the seventeenth century became less charmed with glory than with gain. Their correctors, and their letters, evinced as little delicacy of choice.

In the productions of early printing, may be distinguished the various splendid editions they made of Primers, or Prayer-books. They were embellished with cuts finished in a most elegant taste: many of them were ludicrous, and several were obscene. In one of them an angel is represented crowning the Virgin Mary, and God the Father himself affisting at the ceremony. Sometimes St. Michael is seen overcoming Satan; and sometimes St. Anthony appears attacked by Vol. I.

various devils of most hideous forms. The Prymer of Salisbury, 1531, is full of cuts: at the bottom of the title page there is the following remarkable prayer—

God be in my Bede.

And in my Understandynge.

God be in my Eyen,

And in my Lokynge.

God be in my Mouthe,

And in my Spekynge.

God be in my Herte,

And in my thinkinge.

God be at myn ende,

ERRATA.

Besides the ordinary errors, or errata, which happen in printing a work, there are others which are purposely committed, that the errata may contain what is not permitted to appear in the body of the work.

Thus, for instance, wherever the Inquisition has any power, particularly at Rome, observes Menage, it is not allowed to employ the word fatum, or fata, in any book.

An author, desirous of using the latter word, word, adroitly invented this scheme: he had printed in his book facta; and, in the errata, he put, for facta, read fata.

Scarron has done nearly the same thing, but on another occasion. He had composed some verses, at the head of which he placed this dedication—A Guillemette, Chienne de ma Soeur; but, having a quarrel with his sister, he maliciously put into the errata, instead of Chienne de ma Soeur, read ma Chienne de Soeur.

Lully at the chose of a bad prologue said, the word fin du prologue was an erratum, it should have been fi du prologue.

In a book, there was printed le docte Morel. A wag put into the errata, for le docte Morel, read le docteur Morel. This Morel was certainly not the first docteur who was not docte.

When a fanatic published a mystical work sull of unintelligible raptures, and which he entitled, Les Delices de L'Esprit, a wit said he should print in his errata, for Delices read Delires.

In the year 1561, there was printed a work, entitled, The Anatomy of the Mass. It is a thin octavo, of 172 pages, and it is H 2 accom-accompanied by an Errata of 15 pages! The editor, a pious Monk, informs us, that a very serious reason induced him to undertake this talk: for it is, says he, to forestal the artifices of Satan. He supposes that the Devil, to ruin the fruit of this work, employed two very malicious frauds: the first before it was printed; by drenching the manuscript in a kennel, and thus having reduced it to a most pitiable state, rendered it in several parts illegible: the second, in obliging the printers to commit such numerous blunders; never yet equalled in so finall a work. To combat this double machination of Satan, he was obliged carefully to re-peruse the work, and to form this singular list of the blunders of the printers, who were under the influence of the Devil. All this he relates in an advertisement prefixed to the Errata.

There was a most dreadful controversy, which arose between two samous scholars from a very laughable Erratum, occasioned by the blunder of the printer; and which seemed to threaten very serious consequences to one of the parties. Flavigny wrote two letters, criticising rather freely a polyglot glot Bible, edited by Abraham Ecchellensis. As this learned editor had sometimes censured the labours of a professor who was the friend of Flavigny, this latter applied to him the third and sifth verses of the seventh chapter of Saint Matthew.

These verses he printed in Latin. Ver. 3. Quid vides festucam in oculo fratris tui, et trabem in oculo tuo non vides. Ver. 5. Ejice primum trabem de oculo tuo, et tunc videbis ejicere festucam de oculo fratris tui. Ecchellensis being compelled to anfwer, began with accusing Flavigny of an enormous crime committed in this passage: not only of attempting to correct the sacred text of the Evangelist, but with daring to reject a word, and to supply its place by one, which was not less impious than obscene! This crime he exaggerates with all the virulence of an angry declaimer. But it is too long to transcribe. There are swelling phrases, and a most dreadful accusation. His morals are attacked, and Flavigny sees all his reputation overturned by an accusation which the other seems positive is just. And yet all this terrible reproach is only founded on an Erratum! The whole H 3 cvil gently suffered the first letter of the word Oculo to have dropped from the form, when he happened to touch a line with his singer which did not stand straight! He published another letter to do away the imputation of Ecchellensis; but it is said, that thirty years afterwards his rage against the negligent printer was not extinguished: indeed, certain wits were always reminding him of it.

A blunder in printing, observes a very acute critic, gives an author of sensibility and taste, more uneasiness than four letters full of panegyric can give him pleasure.

ON THE NOTES VARIORUM.

THE Notes Variorum were, originally, only a compilation of notes drawn from those numerous critics who had laboured on the best authors, or had explained them in other works. The first collections were very indifferent, their selectors possessing no powers of discrimination. Frequently, they have have chosen the worst: they bring no proofs from the authors whom they have abridged; and they are continually maining their ideas. To make their collections bulky, they have written as much on the clear as on the obscure passages, and have swelled them with very frivolous digressions.

The later editions of the Notes Variorum have been made by more able compilers. As they are so much the more preferable to the preceding ones, the public has received them with favour; and scholars have been glad to have compleat collections of the most valued criticisms, to consult them at their need.

ON THE EDITIONS OF THE CLASSICS, IN. USUM DELPHINI.

THE Scholiasts, or the Interpreters of the Dauphin, in usum Serenissimi Delphini, were undertaken under the conduct of Messieurs De Montausieur, Bossuet, and Huet. To a correct text, they have added a clear and concise paraphrase of the text, with H4 notes.

notes. The dissimilarity of the genius, and the peculiar characters, of all these authors, have been one great cause that they have not all been treated with the same ability, and with equal selicity: but still, it must be allowed, they form the most beautiful body in literature that the public has ever been gratisfied with.

Another critic presents us with a more satisfactory account of this celebrated edition of the Classics. The greater part of these interpreters have but indifferently executed their employment: they have followed, in their text, the inferior editions, instead of making use of the best; and they have left in the notes those same faults which were so much censured in the Dutcheditions, with the Notes Variorum. There is, however, one thing valuable in the Paris editions—a Verbal Index, by which any passage may be found on recollecting a few words. However, it must be confessed, the munificent patronage of a great monarch has not produced adequate effects. The project was excellent, but the performance was bad.

I cannot conclude this article without obferving what benefits the student derives from from Verbal Indexes. He not only faves a great expence of time, which is squandered in the examination for passages; but he may more easily trace the imitations of others, when they happen to eatch the words of the original. I have received such services from Newton's edition of Milton, which is enriched with a Verbal Index, that I cannot recollect them without gratitude. If a Verbal Index was formed to Johnson's edition of the Poets, it would then become invaluable; and I am sure there are porters enough in literature, unemployed, who defire nothing better than to bear this burthen on their shoulders.

PATRONS.

AUTHORS have too frequently received ill treatment even from those to whom they dedicated their works.

Theodosius Gaza had no other recompence for having inscribed to Sixtus the Fourth his Translation of the book of Aristotle on the Nature of Animals, than the the price of the binding, which this charitable father of the church munificently bestowed upon him.

Theocritus fills his Idylliums with loud complaints of the neglect of his patrons; and Tasso was as little successful in his Dedications.

Ariosto, in presenting his Orlando Furioso to the Cardinal d'Este, was gratissed with the bitter sarcasm of—' Dove diavolo avete pigliato tante coglionerie?' Where the devil have you found all this nonsense?

When the French Historian, Dupleix, whose pen was indeed fertile, presented his book to the Duke d'Epernon, this Mecenas, turning to the Pope's Nuncio, who was prefent, very coarsely exclaimed—' Cadedis! ce Monsieur a un flux enragé, il chie un livre toutes les lunes!'

author of the Seasons, who, having extravagantly praised a person of rank, afterwards appearing to be undeserving of any eulogiums, very properly employed his pen in a solemn recantation of his error. This is a very different behaviour from that of Dupleix, who always spoke highly of Queen Margaret Margaret of France, for a little place he held in her houshold: but after her death, and when his place was extinct, he spoke of her with all the freedom of satire. Such is too often the character of men of letters, who only dare to reveal the truth when they have no interest to conceal it.

Poor Mickle, to whom we are indebted for so beautiful a version of Camoen's Lusiad, having dedicated this work, the continued labour of five years, to a certain lord, had the mortification to find, by the discovery of a friend, that he had kept it in his possession three weeks before he could collect sufficient intellectual desire to cut open the first pages!

'Every man believes,' writes Dr. Johnson, in a letter to Baretti, 'that mistresses are unfaithful, and patrons are capricious. But he excepts his own mistress, and his own patron.'

Bayle has preserved an anecdote which may be inserted here with sufficient propriety, and may serve to shew in what manner a Patron is sometimes obtained. Benserade attached himself to Cardinal Mazarine; but his friendship produced nothing but civility. The

The Poet every day indulged his easy and charming vein of amorous and panegyric poetry, while all the world read and admired his verses. One evening the cardinal, in conversation with the king, mentioned his mode of life when he resided at the papal court. He said he loved the sciences; but that his chief occupation was the belles lettres, and composing little pieces of poetry; and that he was then in the court of Rome what Benserade was now in that of France, Some hours afterwards the friends of the poet related to him the conversation of the cardinal. He heard, and quitted them abruptly. He ran to the apartment of his Eminence, and knocked with all his force, that he might be certain of being heard. The cardinal had just gone to bed. It was in vain that he was informed of this circumstance; he persisted to enter; and as he continued making a most terrible disturbance, they were compelled to open the door. to his Eminence, fell upon his knees, almost pulled off the sheets of his bed in rapture, implored a thousand pardons for thus disturbing him, but such was his joy in what he had just heard, (which he repeated) that he could not refrain from immediately giving vent to his gratitude and his pride, to have been compared with his Eminence for his poetical talents. He said, that had the door not been immediately opened, he should have expired. It is true, he was not rich, but he should now die contented. The Cardinal was pleased with his ardour, and probably never suspected his statery. He assured him of his protection; and six days afterwards rewarded him with a hand-some pension!

On the Cardinal Richelieu, another of his patrons, he gratefully made this Epi-taph—

Cy gift, ouy gist par la mort bleu Le Cardinal de Richelieu, Et ce qui cause mon ennuy Ma PENSION avec lui.

The illustrious Cardinal Richelieu;
My grief is genuine—void of whim;
Alas! my pension lies with him.

POETS, PHILOSOPHERS, AND ARTISTS, MADE BY ACCIDENT.

· ACCIDENT has frequently occasioned the most eminent geniuses to display their Father Mallebranche will Terve for an example. Having compleated his studies in philosophy, and theology, without any other intention than devoting himself to some religious order, he little expected to become of such celebrity as his works have made him. Loitering, in an idle hour, in the shop of a bookseller, in turning over a parcel of books, L'Homme de Descartes fell into his hands. Having dipt into some parts, he was induced to peruse the whole. It was this circumstance that produced those profound contemplations which gave birth to so many beautiful compositions in Phyfics, Metaphysics, and Morality, which have made him pass for the Plato of his age.

Cowley became a poet by accident. In his mother's apartment he found, when very young, Spenser's Fairy Queen; and, by a continual continual study of Poetry, he became so enchanted of the Muse, that he grew irrecoverably a Poet.

We owe to the deformities of Pope's perfon the inimitable beauties of his elaborate verse.

Dr. Johnson informs us, that the late great Painter of the present age, had the first fondness for his art excited by the perusal of Richardson's Treatise.

Helvetius furnishes me with the follow-ing additional instances.

M. Vaucanson displayed an uncommon genius for Mechanics. His taste was sirst determined by this accident; he, when very young, frequently attended his mother'. to the residence of her confessor; and while she wept with repentance, he wept with weariness! In this state of disagreeable vacation he was struck with the uniform motion of the pendulum of the clock in the His curiofity was roused; he approached the clock case, and studied it's mechanism; what he could not discover, he gueised at. He then projected a similar machine; and gradually his genius produced a clock. Encouraged by this first success, fuccess, he proceeded in his various attempts; and the genius which thus could form a clock, in time formed a fluting automaton.

It was a chance of the same kind which inspired our great Milton to write his Epics. Milton, 'fallen on evil days,' was happy to be enabled to retire; and it was in the leifure of retreat and disgrace he executed the poem which he had projected in his youth; and which has enabled our nation to boast of a work which is rivalled by none, if we except the Italians.

- 'If Shakespeare's imprudence had not obliged him to quit his wool trade, and his town; if he had not engaged with a company of actors, and at length, disgusted with being an indifferent performer, he had not turned author; the prudent woolseller had never been the celebrated poet.'
- Accident determined the taste of Moliere for the stage. His grandsather loved the theatre, and frequently carried him there. The young man lived in dissipation: the father observing it, asked, in anger, if his son was to be made an actor. 'Would to God,' replied the grandsather, 'he was as good an actor as Montrose.' The words struck young Moliere; he took a disgust to his tapestry trade; and it is to this circumstance France owes her greatest Comic writer.'

- 'Corneille loved; he made verses for his mistress, became a Poet, composed Melite, and afterwards his other celebrated pieces. The discreet Corneille had remained a lawyer.'
- 'Thus it is, that the devotion of a mother, the death of Cromwell, deer-stealing, the exclamation of an old man, and the beauty of a woman, have given five illustrious characters to Europe,'
- 'I should never have done, (this great man concludes) if I would enumerate all the writers celebrated for their talents, and who owed those talents to similar incidents.'

It is also well known, that we owe the labours of the immortal Newton to a very trivial accident. 'When, in his younger days, he was a student at Cambridge, he had retired during the time of the plague into the country. As he was reading under an appletree, one of the fruit fell, and struck him a smart blow on the head. When he observator.

You I.

ed the smallness of the apple, he was surprized at the force of the stroke. This led him to consider the accelerating motion of falling bodies; from whence he deduced the principles of gravity, and laid the foundation of his philosophy.'

Granger observes on Ignatius Loyola, that he was a Spanish gentleman, who was dangerously wounded at the siege of Pampaluna. Having heated his imagination by reading the Lives of the Saints, which were brought to him in his illness, instead of a romance, he conceived a strong ambition to be the founder of a religious order. This is well known by the appellation of the so-ciety of Jesus, or the Jesuits.

J. J. Rousseau found his eccentric powers first awakened by the advertisement of the singular annual subject which the Academy of Dijon proposed for that year, in which he wrote his celebrated Declamation against the Arts and Sciences. It was this circumstance which determined his suture literary efforts.

La Fontaine, at the age of 22, had not taken any profession, or devoted himself to any pursuit. Having accidentally heard some verses verses of Malherbe, he felt a sudden impression, which gave an eternal direction to his future life. He immediately bought a Malherbe, and was so exquisitely delighted with this Poet, that after passing the nights in treasuring his verses in his memory, he would run in the day-time to the woods, and there concealing himself, he would recite his verses to the surrounding Dryads.

Our celebrated Astronomer, Flamsteed, was an Astrologer by accident. He was taken from school on account of his illness. In the narrative of his life he says, that Sacrobosco's Book de Sphæra, having been lent to him, he was so pleased with it, that he immediately began a course of Astronomic studies. Mr. Pennant, in his life, tells us, that his first propensity to Natural History, was the pleasure he received from an accidental perusal of Willoughby's work on birds.

INEQUALITIES OF GENIUS,

We observe frequently singular Inequalities in the labours of Genius; and particularly in those which admit great enthusiasm, as in Poetry, in Painting, and in Music. But, surely, this is not difficult to be accounted for! Faultless mediocrity Industry can preserve in one continued degree; but excellence is only to be attained, by human faculties, by starts.

Our Poets who possess the greatest Genius, with, perhaps, the least Industry, have at the same time the most splendid and the worst passages of poetry. Shakespeare and Dryden are at once the greatest and the least of our Poets.

The imitative powers of Pope, who possessed more Industry than Genius—though his Genius was nearly equal to that of the greatest Poets—has contrived to render every line faultless: yet it may be said of Pope, that his greatest fault consists in having none.

Carrache sarcastically said of Tintoret—Ho veduto il Tintoretto bora eguale a Titiano, bora minore del Tintoretto—' I have seen Tintoret now equal to Titian, and now less than Tintoret.'

Trublet very justly observes—The more there are beauties, and great beauties, in a work, I am the less surprized to find faults, and great faults. When you say of a work—that —that it has many faults; that decides nothing: and I do not know by this, whether it is execrable, or excellent. You tell me of another—that it is without any faults; if your account be just, it is certain the work cannot be excellent,

CONCEPTION AND EXPRESSION.

THERE are men who have just thoughts on every subject; but it is not perceived, because their expressions are feeble. They conceive well, but they produce badly.

Erasmus acutely observed—alluding to what then much occupied his mind—that one might be apt to swear that they had been taught, in the Consessional Cell, all they had learnt; so scrupulous are they of disclosing what they know. Others, again, conceive ill, and produce well; for they express with elegance, frequently, what they do not know.

It was observed of one pleader, that he knew more than he faid; and of another, that he faid more than he knew.

BOOKS OF LOVE AND DEVOTION,

THE agreeable Menage has this acute observation on the writings of Love and Religion.—'Books of Devotion, and those of Love, are alike bought. The only difference I find is, that there are more who read books of Love, than buy them; and there are more who buy books of Devotion, than read them,' on which we cannot, indeed, write in a florid or elegant diction—such as Geography, Music, Algebra, Geometry, &c. Cicero, who had been intreated by Atticus to write on Geography, excused himself; and observed, that it's scenes were more adapted to please the eye, than susceptible of the rich ornaments of a polished style. However, ever, in these kinds of science, we must supply, by some little words of erudition, the absence of the flowers of elegant diction.

GEOGRAPHICAL DICTION.

Thus if we are to notice some inconsiderable place: for instance; Woodstock, in adding that it was the residence of Chaucer, the parent of our poetry, this kind of erudition pleases even more than all the flowery ornaments of rhetoric.

SAINTS CARRYING THEIR HEADS IN THEIR HANDS,

ILLITERATE persons have imagined, that the representation of a Saint in this manner, was meant to shew a miracle of this kind. But we must do justice to these Saints, by wiping away the obloquy of endeavouring to impose on us this supernatural action.

It was the custom of the Painters, when they drew Saints who had suffered decapitation, to place their beads in their bands, to mark the species of martyrdom they suffered; and the headless trunk, at the same time, would have had a very repulsive effect.

Iŧ

It is said, that when a Lord, in the rebellion of 1745, was committed to prison, on suspicion of corresponding with the Pretender, he caused himself to be painted in the character of St. Denis carrying his head in his hand.

LEGENDS.

THE origin of so many fables and intolerable absurdities, which have been entitled Legends, arises from this circumstance.

Before any colleges were established in the monasteries where the schools were held, the professors in rhetoric frequently gave their scholars the life of some saint for a trial of their talent at amplification. The students, being constantly at a loss to surnish out their pages, invented these wonderful adventures. The good fathers of that age, whose simplicity was not inferior to their devotion, were so delighted with these slowers of rhetoric, that they were induced to make a collection of these miraculous compositions; not imagining that, at some some distant period of time, they would become matters of faith. Yet, when James de Voraigne, (Vicar-general of the Jacobins) Peter Nadal, and Peter Ribadeneira, wrote the Lives of the Saints, they fought for their materials in the libraries of the monasteries; and, awakening from the dust these manuscripts of amplification, imagined they made an invaluable present to the world, by laying before them these bulky absurdities. The people received them with all imaginable simplicity; and, in the last century, it was dangerous for a man to dare even to suspect the reality of these pious fictions. We are indebted to Tillemont, to Fleury, Baillet, Launoi, and Bollandus, for having cleared much of this rubbish; and, rejecting what was false, by an enlightened criticism, have made that probable, which before was doubtful.

'What has been called The Golden Legend, which is the compilation of the above Voraigne,' observes Patin, 'is a book replete with the most ridiculous and silly histories imaginable.' Melchior Canus, who was a learned Dominican, greatly disapproves of this legend; and has said, that sit is a narrative at once unworthy of the Saints, and every honest Christian. I do not know why it should be called golden, composed as it is by a man who had a mouth of iron, and a heart of lead.

Bayle says, that Canus justly observed, that the lives of the ancient philosophers were composed with more judgment than those of the saints of Christianity. When the world began to be more critical in their reading, the Monks gave another turn to their narratives: not so many absurdities were committed; but there remains sufficient still to bear abundant pruning.

It will, probably, be agreeable to the reader, to inspect a specimen of these legends. To gratify his curiosity, I have selected the following; and, that he may not complain of the tedious length of this article, it shall not be given to him in the heavy style of James de Voraigne, or of myself, but embellished by the luminous diction of Mr. Gibbon—

'Among the insipid legends of Ecclesiastical History, I am tempted to distinguish the memorable sable of The Seven Sleepers; whose imaginary date corresponds with the reign reign of the younger Theodosius, and the conquest of Africa by the Vandals. When the Emperor Decius persecuted the Christians, seven noble youths of Ephesus concealed themselves in a spacious cavern, on the fide of an adjacent mountain; where they were doomed to perish by the tyrant, who gave orders that the entrance should be firmly secured with a pile of stones. They immediately fell into a deep flumber, which was miraculoufly prolonged, without injuring the powers of life, during a period of one hundred and eighty-feven years. At the end of that time, the flaves of Adolius. to whom the inheritance of the mountain had descended, removed the stones, to supply materials for fome ruftic edifice. light of the fun darted into the cavern, and the Seven Sleepers were permitted to awake. After a flumber, as they thought, of a few hours, they were pressed by the calls of hunger; and resolved that Jamblichus, one of their number, should secretly return to the city, to purchase bread for the use of his companions. The youth—if we may still employ that appellation-could no longer recognize the once familiar aspect of his native country; and his surprize was increased by the appearance of a large cross, triumphantly erected over the principal gate of Ephesus. His singular dress and obsolete language confounded the baker, to whom he offered an ancient medal of Decius, as the current coin of the empire; and Jamblichus, on the suspicion of a secret treasure, was dragged before the judge. Their mutual enquiries produced the amazing discovery, that two centuries were almost elapsed since Jamblichus and his friends had escaped from the rage of a Pagan tyrant. The bishop of Ephesus, the clergy, the magistrates, the people, and, it is said, the Emperor Theodosius himself, hastened to visit the cavern of the Seven Sleepers; who bestowed their benediction, related their story, and at the same instant peaceably expired.

'Mr. Gibbon adds.' Mr. Gibbon adds.' Mahomet learned when he drove his camels to the fairs of Syria; and he has introduced it, as a divine revelation, into the Koran.'—The same story has been adopted and adorned by the nations, from Bengal to Africa, who profess the Mahometan religion.

ARABIC PROVERBS.

There are persons who set out vigorously, but soon slag, and go back; like a star which promises rain, and immediately leaves the sky clear. This poetical thought Schultens interprets of such as make large promises, and even design to execute them, but fall short, for want of constancy and resolution.

Every one living is cut down by Death: kappy the man who is mowed down green! This beautiful sentiment requires no illustration.

Why are you displeased at the words of one who advises with sincerity; since such a person mends your torn cloaths? Here it is observed, that mending what is torn, is applied, in a figurative sense, to the ill condition of the mind.

The cure of a proud man is performed by driving out his buzzing fly, and taking Satan out of his nostrils. Here Schultens remarks, that that the noisy boastings of the haughty man are beautifully represented by the trouble: some and infignificant buzzing of a large fly.

The dam of the roaring BEAST is not very prolific; but the dain of the barking BEAST produces many whelps. By the roaring Beast, is here meant the Lion; by the barking Beast, the Dog. The sense of the proverb is—That persons of great and elevated accomplishments are but sew; those of a contrary character, very numerous.

THE FATHERS OF THE CHURCH.

THE present criticism is drawn from the Abbé Longuerue.

He, of all the Fathers of the ancient Christians who best have composed in Latin, is Sulpicius Severus, particularly in his History.

Lactantius has many splendid passages scattered in his works.

St. Augustine, who had studied Cicero very attentively, has not, however, taken him him for his model in his writings; or rather, could never approach him in any degree.

St. Jerome has sometimes passages which may be read with pleasure; but he is strangely unequal.

St. Ambrose has endeavoured to imitate Cicero; but there is a wide difference betwint them.

Saints are sometimes Plagiarists.—It is a strong trait in the character of the piety of Pope Gregory the Seventh, that he caused the greater part of the most finished compositions of the ancients to be destroyed; doubtless, because the authors of them were Pagans. It was this Pope who burnt the works of Varro, the learned Roman, that Saint Augustine should not be accused of plagiarism; for this Saint owes to the labours of Varro his books of The City of God.

The learned authors of the Literary History of France observe, Vol. IX. p. 406, that Saint Ambrose has made very free use of the writings of Didymus. It will be allowed, at least, that their criticism is fair. They are liberal writers; but as Benedictines, they will, as much as they can, veil the nakedness of the Fathers of the Church. That Saints should condescend to imitate the compositions of profane authors, is rather wonderful; nor less wonderful is it that they should attempt, with all the rage of mere human envy, to conceal their depredations in a way, that, in any other person than a Saint, we could not sufficiently reprobate.

SEVERE CRITICISM.

An unmerciful Critic observes, that there are few books to which an Author can pre-fix bis name, without trespassing upon his veracity: for there is not one work which is the labour of a single person.

When a Poet was reproached for his Plagiarisms, (which he probably called Classical Imitations) he defended himself in this manner.—That a painter was not less a painter, nor an architect less an architect, because the one purchased his colours, and the other his building materials. 'It is all pouring out of one bottle into another,' exclaimed Sterne;—who himself stole this thought, with

With others, from Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy. The original Sterne is himself frequently a Plagiarist; but the plagiarisms of a man of genius cease to be such. He is not a little indebted to Gallic authors.

An ingenious writer justly enough obferves, that the ancients had stalen all his best thoughts from him.

Another exclaims — Pereant, qui ante, nos nostra dixerunt! Perish those, who, before us, have said, what we say!

All is said, (writes La Bruyere) and we come too late; since it is more than seven thousand years that so many men have reflected, We only glean after the Ancients, and the most skilful of the Moderns.

D'Ablancourt was an admirable translator; his versions were free, and masterly, He who reads the copy, has the pleasure of tasting the original. This lively and elegant writer, confined himself to translation, though he possessed talents which would have distinguished him as an original author. To one who asked him, why he, who wrote so well, should prefer to be a Translator rather than an Author? he answered—'That the greater part of modern works were only repetitions Vol. I. of the ancients; and that, to be serviceable to his country, it was better to translate good books, than to make new ones, which in general convey no new information.' This criticism of D'Ablancourt is not less just than severe.

THE BELLES LETTRES.

IT seems to be the fate of the Belles Lettres, an ingenious French writer observes, that they break out in all their splendour during some ages, and then are again doomed to decline into total neglect.

Athens long preserved a correct taste in Eloquence, in Philosophy, and in Poetry. At the same time the Fine Arts slourished in all their beauty; but a frightful barbarism soon succeeded the refinement and the science of this ingenious nation.

The Romans, having vanquished the Greeks, awakened the Muses from their lethargy; and the Augustan age was for Italy what that of Pericles had been for Greece. The decline of that empire soon occasioned that that of the Belles Lettres; and the invasions of those people who dismembered the Roman Empire threw all again into barbarism and ignorance. Charlemagne attempted to revive the sciences: he rewarded the learned; and he established schools in the principal cities of the empire. It was his command, that a number of volumes should be transcribed, to be dispersed throughout the kingdom.

Our illustrious Alfred began the same reformation in England. Engaged as he was in one continued war with the Danes, nothing could disturb the designs he had formed for the restoration of letters. He laments the ignorance of the times with all the indignation of the philosopher, and the resentment of a patriot prince.

The attempts of these great monarchs availed little: the clash of arms taught a melancholy silence to the Muses. Since those times, as the monarchical government became more sirmly established, the Belles Lettres insensibly revived:

But it was chiefly under the pontificate of Leo the Tenth, that munificent patron of literature, that they sprung up in all their their richest luxuriance. Assisted by the art of printing, which had been discovered some time before, they made those immense progresses, and formed those heroes of literature, who so forcibly claim our warmest admiration.

ON TEACHING THE CLASSICS.

Those, says Marville, who undertake the instruction of youth, and who read the ancients with their scholars, should point out to their observation the characteristic trait of each of these authors. This manner of teaching might inspire them to emulate these perfect models of composition.

Xenophon, for instance, and Quintilian, are excellent to form the education of young scholars.

Plato will fill the mind with great notions, and elevate them into a contemplation of the sublimest metaphysics.

Aristotle will instruct them acutely to analyse the principles of composition, and to decide on the beauties of the works of imagination.

Cicero

Cicero will shew them how to speak and to write with grace: Seneca to philosophise.

The elder Pliny opens the mind to a great diversity of knowledge. Æsop and Phædrus, in an amusing way, will form their manners.

Epictetus, and the Emperor Antoninus, will afford them advice and counsels in every station of human life.

Plutatch offers the noblest examples of antiquity, and furnishes excellent matter for attic conversations.

Homer displays man in every possible situation, and paints him always great.

Virgil inculcates piety towards the gods, and filial tenderness towards our parents.

In Sallust, the portraits of the great may be contemplated; in Plautus and Terence, those of individuals; in Horace, and the Younger Pliny, the delicate eulogiums which may be administered to kings.

But, before these great models are offered to the study of our youth, as they claim a maturity of judgment, let them first be initiated by some elementary works.

NOBLEMEN TURNED CRITICS.

I OFFER to the contemplation of those unfortunate mortals, who are necessitated to undergo the criticisms of Lords, this pair of anecdotes—

A cardinal having caused a statue to be made at Rome, by the great Angelo, when it was finished came to inspect it; and having, for some time, sugaciously considered it, poring now on the face, then on the arms, the knees, the form of the leg, and, at length, on the foot itself; the statue being of such perfect beauty, he found himself at a loss to display his powers of criticism, but by lavishing his praise. But he recollected, that only to praise, might appear as if there had been an obtuseness in the keenness of his criticism. He trembled to find a fault, but a fault must be found. At length, he ventured to mutter fomething concerning the nose; it might, he thought, be something more Grecian. Angelo differed from his Grace, but he said he would attempt to gratify his tafte. took up his chiffel, and concealed fome marble-dust in his hand; and, feigning to retouch the part, he adroitly let fall forme of the dust he held concealed. The cardinal observing it as it fell, transported at the idea of his critical acumen, exclaimed-' Ah, Angelo! you have now given to it an inimitable grace!'

When Pope was first introduced to read his Iliad to Lord Halifax, the noble Critic did not venture to be diffatisfied with for perfect a composition: but, like the cardinal, this passage, and that word, this turn, and that expression, formed the broken cant of his criticisms. The honest Poet was stung with vexation; for, in general, the parts at which his lordship hesitated, were those of which he was most satisfied. As he returned home with Sir Samuel Garth, he revealed to him the anxiety of his mind. 'Oh,' replied Garth, laughing, ' you are not fo well acquainted with his lordship as myself; he must criticise. At your next vifit, read to him those very passages as they now stand; tell him that you have recollected his criticisins; and I'll warrant you of hia his approbation of them. This is what I have done a hundred times myself. Pope made use of this stratagem: it took, like the marble-dust of Angelo; and my lord, like the cardinal, exclaimed—' Dear Pope, they are now inimitable!'

THE ART OF CRITICISM.

An eminent French writer has thus very ingeniously traced the origin of Criticism.

The Art of Criticism is by no means a modern invention; but it must be confessed, that in the last age alone it hath reached it's present degree of persection.

According to Dion Chrysostom, Aristotle is the inventor of Criticism, it is, at least, certain that it appeared about his time.

Aristarchus, who flourished at Samos, about one hundred and sifty years before the Christian Æra, wrote nine books of Corrections of the Iliad and Odyssey, and spread a general alarm amongst the race of Authors; insomuch that, to the present day, a Critic, and an Aristarchus, are synonimous words.

As

As the Sciences were, for a long time, neglected, Criticism shared the same fate. There were, however, even in the most barabarous ages, a sew learned men who cultivated it. At the restoration of Letters, Criticism, by the efforts of many celebrated scholars, sprung up with new vigour. But two important events contributed equally to the revival of Letters and of Criticism: the taking of Constantinople, by the Turks, which occasioned several of the learned to retire into Italy and France; and the invention of Printing, which was discovered about that time.

As foon as this admirable Art was made public, they applied themselves to publishing excellent editions of all the good authors, according to the most correct manufcripts. They were indefatigable in their researches for the most ancient copies, and they collated them with the modern ones, by the strictest rules of Criticism.

Some formed Dictionaries and Grammars of different languages; and some Commentaries, for illustrating the text. Others composed Treatifes on Fabulous History, on the Religion, Government, and the Mi-

divelt on the minutest particulars which concerned their Manners, their Apparel, their Repasts, their Amusements, &c. In a word, they neglected nothing which, after so wide an interval, might throw new lights on what remained of the Grecian and the Roman Compositions.

The learned of the fixteenth century made new efforts, not only to clear the uncultivated lands of the Republic of Letters, which had remained unexplored by their predecessors, but also to improve those they had inherited. They prided themselves in the freest discussions; they rumaged every library, to bring to light unnoticed manuscripts; they compared them together: they arranged those historical sacts which were necessary to restore the texts, and to fix the dates; and they were careful, above all things, not to decide on the sense of a passage without a mature examination, and a laborious collation.

Yet, after the immense labours of Justus Lipsius, the Scaligers, Turnebus, Budæus, Erasmus, and so many other learned men, Crivicism still remained imperfect; and it is only only in the last age that it attained to the height which it has now reached.

This perfection of Criticism is owing to the establishment of ACADEMIES, particularly those of the French and the Belles Lettres Academies. In their labours may be found those numerous and judicious remarks, which had escaped the penetration of the first scholars in Europe.

I cannot quit this article without observing, that it is much to the dishonour of the national character, no Academy, dedicated to the Belles Lettres, has ever been established. To raise such an Academy, is a glory still reserved for an Augustan Monarch.

Louis XIV, has all his foibles forgiven by posterity, when they contemplate the munificent patronage he bestowed on Men of Letters. The splendours of Royalty, and the trophies of Ambition, may elevate the voice of Adulation; but they expire with the Hero and the Monarch. The beneficial influence of Literature is felt through successive ages; and they, indeed, are the Benefactors of mankind, who bestow on posterity their their most refined pleasures, and their most useful speculations.

Voltaire, indeed, confesses, that the great characters of the Literary Republic were formed without the aid of Academies. For what then, he asks, are they necessary?—
To preserve and nourish, he says, the sire which great geniuses have kindled.

IMPOSITIONS OF AUTHORS.

THERE have been fome Authors who have practifed singular Impositions on the public. Varillas, the French historian, enjoyed for some time a great reputation in his own country for his historic compositions. When they became more known, the scholars of other countries destroyed the reputation he had unjustly acquired. 'His continual professions of sincerity prejudiced many in his favour, and made him pass for a writer who had penetrated into the inmost recesses of the cabinet: but the public were at length undeceived, and were convinced that that the historical anecdotes, which Varillas put off for authentic facts, had no foundation, being wholly his own inventing!—though he endeavoured to make them pass for realities, by affected citations of titles, instructions, letters, memoirs, and relations, all of them imaginary!

Melchisedec Thevenot, librarian to the French king, was never out of Europe; yet he has composed some solio volumes of his 'Voyages and Travels,' by information and memoirs, which he collected from those who had travelled. 'Travels,' observes the compiler of the Biographical Dictionary, 'related at second-hand, can never be of any great authority or moment.' Assuredly not; but they may be pregnant with errors of all kinds.

Gemelli Carreri, a Neapolitan gentleman, who, for many years, never quitted his chamber, being confined by a tedious indisposition, amused himself with writing a voyage round the world; giving characters of men, and descriptions of countries, as if he had really visited them. Du Halde, who has written so voluminous an account of China, compiled it from the Memoirs of the Mission-

Missionaries, and never travelled ten leagues from Paris in his life; though he appears, by his writings, to be very familiar with the Chinese scenery.

This is an excellent observation of an anonymous author:—'Writers who never visited foreign countries, and Travellers who have run through immense regions with sleeting pace, have given us long accounts of various countries and people; evidently collected from the idle reports and absurd traditions of the ignorant vulgar, from whom only they could have received those relations which we see accumulated with such undifcerning credulity.'

When the Abbé Fleury began to write his Ecclesiastical History, he had never made any studies in Chronology or Historic Criticism. He studied every day for what he was to write; and when he wrote the history of one year, he was ignorant of what passed the following one. It is thus his History (observes Longerue) is very meagre.

Gregorio Leti is an historian of much the same stamp as Varillas. He wrote with great facility, and hunger generally quickened

ened his pen. He took every thing too lightly; yet his works are rather esteemed for many curious anecdotes of English history which are to be found in them, and which are not met with essewhere. But his great aim was always to make a book, so that he swells his volumes with a thousand idle digressions; and, with a view of amusing his readers, intersperses many low and ridiculous stories; and gives to illustrious characters all the repartees and good things he collected from old novel writers.

Most of our old translations from the Greek and Latin Authors, were taken from French versions.

Some Authors have practifed the fingular imposition of publishing a variety of titles of works, as if ready for the press, but of which nothing but the titles have been written. Paschal, historiographer to France, forged such titles, that his pension for writing on the History of France might be continued. When he died, all his historical works did not exceed six pages!

A living author assures me, that when a certain bistorian was employed on his history, he pointed out to him a collection of manuscripts, which would have afforded him ample and new materials for his work; but he answered, in all the pride of a modern author—' I have too much to write, to be enabled to read.' It is thus, that in the prefent day Novels are written like Histories, and Histories like Novels.

THE PORT ROYAL SOCIETY.

EVERY lover of Letters must have heard of the Port Royal Society, many have benefitted by the labours of these learned men; but, perhaps, sew have attended to their origin, and to their dissolution.

The Society of the Port Royal des Champs —that was the original title—took this name from a valley about fix leagues from Paris.

In the year 1637, Le Maitre, a celebrated Advocate, renounced the bar, and resigned the honour of being Conseiller d'Etat, which his uncommon merit had obtained him, though then only twenty-eight years of age. His brother, De Sericourt, who had followed the military profession, quitted it at the same same time. Both consecrating themselves to the service of God, they retired into a little house near the Port Royal of Paris. Their brothers, De Sacy, De St. Elme, and De Valmont, joined them. Arnauld, one of their most illustrious associates, was induced to enter into the Jansenian Controversy. It was then they had to encounter the powerful persecution of the Jesuits. They were constrained to remove themselves from that spot, and they then fixed their residence at Port Royal des Champs. There again the Court disturbed them, after a residence of little more than two months; but, about a year afterwards, they again returned.

With these illustrious Recluses many persons of distinguished merit now retired: and it was this community which has been since called the Society of Port Royal.

Here were no rules, no vows, no constitution, and no cells formed. Prayer and study were their only occupations. They applied themselves to the education of young men, and initiated the rising generation into science, and into virtue.

It was here Racine received his educa-Vol. I. L tion; tion; and, on his death-bed, desired to be buried in the cemetery of the Port Royal, at the feet of M. Hamon. An amiable in-stance, this, of the Poet's sensibility!

Anne de Bourbon, a princess of the blood-royal, er-cted a house near the Port Royal, and was, during her life, the power-ful patroness of these solitary and religious men: but her death happening in 1679, gave the satal stroke which dispersed them for ever.

The envy and the fears of the Jesuits, and their rancour against Arnauld, who with such ability had exposed their designs, occasioned the destruction of the Port Royal Society.

These were men (De Juvigny writes in his Discourse on the Progress of Literature in France) whom the love of retirement united, to cultivate Literature in Peace, in the midst of solitude and piety. They formed a society of learned men, amongst whom a fine taste for Letters and sound Philosophy reigned. Alike occupied on the holy as well as on the profane writers, they edified while they enlightened the world. It was by their writings the French language guage was fixed. It is by the example of these Solitaries, we may observe how retirement is favourable to penetrate into the sanctuary of the Muses; and that it is by meditating in silence on the Oracles of Taste, we may attain to imitate, and even to equal them.

An interesting anecdote is related of Arnauld on the occasion of the dissolution of this society. The dispersion of these great men, and their young scholars, was lamented by every one but their enemies. persons of the highest rank participated in their forrows. The excellent Arnauld, in that moment, was as closely pursued as if he had been an highwayman. A pleasing anecdote is related of the Duchess of Longueville, who was the great patroness of Jansenism. When Arnauld lay concealed in an obscure lodging, he fell ill: a physician was called; and, in the course of their conversation, Arnauld asked what was new at Paris?—' Nothing very interesting,' replied the doctor; 'only it is said that Mr. Arnauld is committed to prison.'—' Oh, as for that news,' replied the philosopher, too quickly, quickly, 'I don't believe it; for I am Aranauld himself?' The doctor, astonished, pointed out his imprudence—'Fortunately, he added, 'I am a man of honour.' He went to inform the duchess, his patroness, who, alarmed, immediately had him conveyed to her palace. She there gave him an apartment; concealed him in her chamber, and persisted to attend him hersels.—'Ask,' she said, 'what you want of the servant, but it shall be myself who shall bring it to you.'

How caustic was the retort courteous which Arnauld gave the Jesuits—' I do not sear,' said he, 'your pen, but your pen knife.'

THE PROGRESS OF OLD AGE IN NEW STUDIES.

Socrates learnt to play on musical instruments in his old age: Cato, at eighty, thought proper to learn Greek; and Plutarch, almost as late in life, Latin.

Theophrastus began his admirable work on on the Characters of Men at the extreme age of ninety. He only terminated his literary labours by his death.

Peter Ronsard one of the fathers of French Poetry, applied himself late to study; but by the acuteness of his genius, and continual application, he rivalled those poetic models which he admired.

One John Gelida, a Spaniard, commenced the studies of polite literature at forty.

Henry Spelman, having neglected the Sciences in his youth, cultivated them at fifty years of age, and produced good fruit.

Fairfax, after having been General of the parliamentary forces, retired to Oxford to take his degrees in law.

Colbert, the famous French minister, almost at fixty, returned to his Latin and law studies.

Tellier, the Chancellor of France, learnt logic, merely for an amusement, to dispute with his grand-children.

Dryden's most pleasing productions were written in his old age. Dr. Johnson applied himself to the Dutch language but a few years before his death. But on this head, the Marquis de Saint Aulaire may be L 3 regarded regarded as a prodigy: at the age of seventy he began to court the Muses, and they crowned him with their sweetest flowers. His verses are full of fire, of delicacy, and sweetness. Voltaire says, that Anacreon, less old, produced less charming compositions.

Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, were the composition of his latest years: they were begun in his sifty-fourth year and sinished in his sixty-first,: it is on these works his same is established, at least they are those which are most adapted to attract all classes of poetical readers.

The celebrated Boccaccio was thirty-five years of age when he began his studies in polite Literature. He has, however, excelled many whose whole life has been devoted to this branch of letters. Such is the privilege of genius.

Ludovico Monaldesco, at the extraordinary age of 115, wrote the Memoirs of his time. This singular exertion is noticed by Voltaire, who quotes the work; which must be curious, were it only for having been written by such a person.

Koornhert began at forty to learn the Latin

Latin and Greek languages, of which he became a master. See Bayle.

Accorso, a great lawyer, being asked why he began the study of the Law so late, answered, that indeed he began it late, but should therefore master it the sooner.

Dryden's complete works form the largest body of Poetry from the pen of one writer in the English language; yet he gave no public testimony of poetical abilities till his 27th year. In his 68th year he proposed to translate the whole Ilias.

Michael Angelo preserved his creative genius even in extreme old age; for he worked almost to his last day; and he reached his 90th year.

SPANISH POETRY.

PERE BOUHOURS observes, that the Spanish poets display an extravagant imagination, which is by no means destitute of wit; but which evinces little taste or judgment.

Their

Their verses are much in the style of our Cowley—trivial Points, monstrous Metaphors, and forced Conceits. A true poetical taste is not pleased with such wild chimeras, but requires the fine touches of Nature and Passion.

Lopes de Vega, in describing an afflicted Shepherdess, in one of his pastorals, who is represented weeping near the sea-side, says — That the Sea joyfully advances to gather her tears; and that, having enclosed them in shells, it converts them into pearls.

Y el mar como imbidiolo

A tierra por las lagrimas salia,

Las guarda en conchas, y convierte en perlas.

Gongora, whom the Spaniards so greatly admire, and whom they distinguish, amongst their poets, by the epithet of The wonder-ful, is full of these points and conceits.

He imagines that a nightingale, who enchantingly varied her notes, and sung in different manners, had a hundred thousand other nightingales in her breast, which alternately sung through her throat—

Con diferencia tal, con gracia tanta,

A quel ruysenor llora, que sospecho

Que tiene otros cien mil dentro del pecho,

Que alterna su dolor por su garganta.

Of a young and beautiful lady he says, that she has but a few years of life, but many ages of beauty.

Muchos figlos de hermosura En pocos anos de edad.

This thought, as Bouhours justly obferves, is false. Many ages of beauty does not present a fine idea: this can only signify a superannuated beauty; one whose charms must be effaced by time. A face of two or three ages old could have but sew charms.

He calls the Girasole, which he imagines (though a botanist tells me falsely) lasts longer than the generality of flowers, 'Mathusalen de las floras;' because Methusalem lived to a greater age than the other Patriarchs.

In one of his Odes, he gives to the River of Madrid the title of the Duke of Streams, and the Viscount of Rivers—

· Mança-

' Mançanares, Mançanares, Os que en todo el aguatismo, Estois Duque de Arreyos, Y Visconde de los Rios.'

He did not venture to call it a Spanish Grandee, for, in fact, it is but a shallow and dirty stream; and, as Quevedo informs us—' The Mançanares is reduced, during the summer-season, to the melancholy condition of the wicked Rich Man, who asks for water in the depths of hell.'

Concerning this River a pleasant witticism is recorded. A Spaniard passing it, one day, when it was perfectly dry, and observing that the superb bridge, which Philip the Second had built over it, served to very little purpose, archly remarked—'That it would be proper that the bridge should be sold, to purchase water.' Es menester, vender la puente por comprar agua.

SAINT EVREMOND.

THE portrait of St. Evremond, delineataed by his own hand, will not be unacceptable to many readers.

A French

A French critic has observed of this writer, that he had great wit, and frequently has written well; but there is a strange inequality throughout his works.

The comparisons which he has formed betwixt some of the illustrious Ancients, are excellent; the Criticisms which he has given on several authors are valuable; but, in the greater part of his works, he sinks to mediocrity. His poetry is insipid, and not the composition of genius, but study. His prosaic style is too full of points: the Antithesis was his favourite sigure, and he is continually employing it.

This last censure, I am fearful, may reach the present character which he has given of himself: but still it is ingenious, and offera a lively picture to the imagination—

'I am a Philosopher, as far removed from superstition as from impiety; a Voluptuary, who has not less abhorrence for debauchery than inclination for pleasure; a Man, who has never known want or abundance. I occupy that station of life, which is despised by those who possess every thing; envied by those who have nothing, and only relished by those who make their felicity to consist.

in the exercise of their reason. Young, I hated diffipation; convinced that a man must possess wealth to provide for the comforts of a long life: old, I disliked œconomy; as I believed that we need not greatly dread want, when we have but a short time to be miserable. I am satisfied with what. Nature has done for me; nor do I repine at Fortune. I do not feek in men what they have of evil, that I may censure; I only find out what they have ridiculous, that I may be amused. I feel a pleasure in detecting their follies; I should feel a greater in communicating my discoveries, did not my prudence restrain me. Life is too short, according to my ideas, to read all kinds of books, and to load our memory with an infinite number of things, at the cost of our judgment. I do not attach myself to the sentiments of scientific men, to acquire Science; but to the most rational, that I may strengthen my reason. Sometimes, I seek for the more delicate minds, that my taste may imbibe their delicacy; sometimes, for the gayer, that I may enrich my genius with their gaiety: and, although I constantly read, I make it less my occupation than my pleasure, pleasure. In Religion, and in Friendship, I have only to paint myself such as I am—in friendship, more tender than a philosopher; and, in religion, as constant, and as sincere, as a Youth who has more simplicity than experience. My Piety is composed more of justice and charity, than of penitence. I rest my considence on God, and hope every thing from His benevolence. In the bosom of Providence I find my repose, and my felicity.'

MEN OF GENIUS DEFICIENT IN CON-VERSATION.

THE Student, who may, perhaps, shine a luminary of Learning and of Genius, in the pages of his volume, is found, not rarely, to lie obscured beneath a thick cloud in colloquial discourse.

It is the Superficial Mind that reflects little, but speaks fluently, that appears to the vulgar (who are better judges of the quantity than of the quality of words) a constellation of abilities.

If you love the Man of Letters, seek him in in the privacies of his study; or, if he be a Man of Virtue, take him to your bosom. It is in the hour of confidence and tranquillity; his Genius may elicit a ray of intelligence, more fervid than the labours of polished composition.

The great Peter Corneille, whose genius resembled that of our Shakespeare, and who has so forcibly expressed the sublime sentiments of the Hero, had nothing in his exterior manners that indicated his genius: on the contrary, his conversation was so insipiled, that it never failed of wearying his auditors. Nature, who had lavished on him the extraordinary gifts of Genius, had forgotten, or rather distained, to blend with them her more ordinary ones. He did not even speak, correctly, that language, of which he was such a master.

When his friends represented to him, in the trite cant of the vulgar, how much more he might please, by not disdaining to correct these trivial errors, he would smile, and say—' I am not the less Peter Gorneille!'

The deficiencies of Addison, in conversation, are well known. He preserved a rigid silence amongst strangers; but, if he was silent, filent, it was the silence of meditation. He probably, at that moment, laboured more in his reslections, than had he been in his study. It was this silence that enlightened a whole nation diurnally.

The vulgar may talk; but it is for Genius to observe.

The 'prating Mandeville,' pert, frothy, and empty, in his Misanthropic Compositions, compared Addison, after having passed an evening in his company, to 'a silent Parson in a tye-wig.' It is no shame for an Addison to receive the censures of a Mandeville: he has only to blush when he calls down those of a Pope.

Virgil, we are told, was very heavy in conversation, and resembled more an ordinary man than an enchanting poet.

La Fontaine (says La Bruyere) appeared coarse, heavy, and stupid; he could not speak or describe what he had just seen: but when he wrote, he was the model of Poetry. All is lightness, elegance, fine natural sentiments, and delicacy of expression, throughout his works.

It is very easy, said a humorous observer, (in speaking concerning La Fontaine) to be a man a man of wit, or a fool; but to be both, and that too in the extreme degree, is indeed admirable, and only to be found in him.

Isocrates, celebrated for his beautiful oratorical compositions, was of so timid a disposition, that he never ventured to speak in public. He compared himself to the whetstone, which will not cut, but enables other things to do this: for his productions served as models to other orators.

Dryden says of himself, 'my conversation is slow and dull, my humour saturnine and reserved. In short, I am none of those who endeavour to break jests in company, or make repartees.'

VIDA.

What a consolation must it be for an aged parent to see his child, by the efforts of his own merits, attain, from the humblest obscurity, to distinguished eminence! What a transport must it yield to the man of sensibility to return to the obscure dwelling of his his parent, and to embrace him, adorned with public honours! Poor Vida was deprived of this satisfaction; but he is placed higher in our esteem by the present anecdore, than even by that classic composition, which rivals the Art of Poetry of his great master.

Ferome Vida, after having long served two Popes, had at length attained to the Episcopacy. Arrayed in the robes of his new dignity, he prepared to visit his aged parents, and selicitated himself with the raptures which the old couple would seel, in embracing their son as their Bishop. When he arrived at their village, he learnt, that it was but a few days since they were no more! His sensibilities were exquisitely pained. The Muse, elegantly querulous, dictated some Elegiac Verse; and, in the sweetest pathos, deplored the Death and the Disappointment of his parents.

METAPHORS.

CARDINAL PERRON has a very judicious criticism on Metaphors. Cicero compares Vol. I. M them them to Virgins, who should not too familiarly shew themselves, and who must appear without affectation. We frequently meet with many that are not only vicious, but disgussful, and have nothing of that by which Cicero is desirous they should be distinguished.

Is it possible that some authors are ignorant that Style is meant to delight? And, if they write vicious and disgustful Metaphors, should they even convey to the reader their meaning, they must offend?—Such as those which a fanatical Preacher employed, when he called on the Lord to wipe his lips with the napkin of his love; and when he talked of the lamp of love; and the candle of divine grace.

Du Bartas, who was a famous poet in bis day, calls the Sun, the Lord of Candles—the Winds, the Postillions of Æolus—Thunder, the Drum of the gods. These wretched metaphors arose from that total want of taste, which both the poet and his age evinced. Notwithstanding these vicious thoughts, I have read some fine verses in his Weeks.

All the lay preachers in Cromwell's time abounded with such metaphors: the titles of their works are sufficient proofs. One Saltmarsh published a book, entitled—The Smoke in the Temple; and this was immediately answered by a congenial genius, with —A Flaming Fire in Zion!

Bishop Latimer preached, in the year 1527, a sermon, in which he says— Now, ye have heard what is meant by this first card, and how ye ought to play: I purpose again to deal unto you another card of the same suit; for they be of so nigh affinity, that one cannot be well played without the other.'

About the middle of the seventeenth century, a country minister—Fuller informs us—imitated these ridiculous allusions of Latimer; but the congregation, now somewhat more refined than in the good bishop's time, could not refrain from immoderate peals of laughter.

Perron observes, that in employing Metaphors, we must not descend from the general to the particular: we may be allowed to say—the flames of love, but not the candle, the lamp, and the wick of love. Saint Anselm exclaims—' Draw me, O Lord! that M 2 I may

I may run after thee; fasten me with the cords of thy Love! The Metaphor is a little similitude, or an abridgment of a similitude—it must pass quick; we must not dwell upon it; when it is too far continued, it is vicious, and degenerates into an Enigma.

Pere Bouhours also observes, that Metaphors must not be continued too far, and that when they are thus overstrained, they become trisling and frigid. These two instances will explain what is here meant—

An Italian, on his return from Poland, faid, that the persons of that country were as white as their snows; but, that they were even colder than they were white; and that frequently, from their conversations, he caught a cold.

Costar says, that the Lectures of Malherbe were satisfing and cloying to a degree—so as to destroy the appetite of those who heard them, and to save them the expence of a dinner.

Of the first it is to be observed, that Cold, as a figure, is an established Metaphor; but that from this cold we are likely to catch one, is what passes the just limits of the Meanne, is what limits and limits of the Meanne, is what limits and limits limits of the Meanne, is what limits and limits limits of the Meanne, is what limits limits of the Meanne, is what limits limits of the Meanne, is what limits limits limits limits of the Meanne, is what limits lin taphor; as well as these lectures, which cloyed till they occasioned a loss of appetite, and faved the expence of a dinner.

It was faying enough, that they were fatiating and disagreeable, without adding the rest, which goes to such an extreme, and which is not likely. This, however, must be understood, when the author speaks in a ferious style: for, if he means to employ such Metaphors jocularly, they would then not shock us; because, when we laugh, we may be allowed great latitude; and, according to Aristotle and Quintilian, whenever we joke, the falsest thoughts have, in some measure, a true sense.

To illustrate this criticism. Let us try these two thoughts; which, however carried far, have great merit, when we reflect on the manner in which they must be understood.

An ancient satirist says, that if we wish to temper an overheated bath, we have only to beg a certain rhetorician to enter; because he was remarkable for frigidity in his discourses. A modern satirest declares, he was lately frozen at reading a certain Elegy

Elegy of a miserable poetaster; and that the polar frosts do not, by many degrees, approach it.

GIBBON.

A FRIEND observes, that he had remarked, in reading Gibbon, two matters, in which he has been grossly mistaken. One was, the Standard of our English Coin, when he compares it, in a note, with that of some Foreign Coin he had to estimate. The other point was, when, in speaking of a religious sect who used to fast on certain days, he adds-' They probably derived this custom from that of the Jews fasting on their sabbath.' This is a flagrant error; since it has always been their custom, rather to indulge in festal enjoyments on that day. It is, with them, a rule to observe no Fast on the Sabbath, though it might be the anniversary of the most remarkable event. The day of Expiation is the only Fast permitted to be kept on the Seventh day.

The

The passages here alluded to have not yet been discovered. I insert this slight criticism, merely for the information respecting the Jews.

ABELARD.

ALTHOUGH Abelard, an author so famous for his writings, and his amours with Eloisa, or rather Heloise, is ranked not among the Orthodox, but the Heretics, because he ventured to publish opinions concerning the Trinity, which were in those times thought too subtle and too bold; yet. it is probably owing to his superior genius that he appeared so culpable in the eyes of his enemies. The cabal formed against him disturbed the earlier part of his life with a thousand persecutions; till at length they persuaded Bernard, his old friend, but who had now turned faint, that poor Abelard was what their malice described him to be. Bernard, enflamed against him, condemned, unheard, the unfortunate scholar. But it is remarkable, that the book which M 4 was was burnt as unorthodox, and as the composition of Abelard, was in fact written by Peter Lombard, Bishop of Paris; a work which has since been canonized in the Sorbonne, and on which is founded the scholastic theology. We may add also, that because Abelard, in the warmth of honest indignation, had reproved the Monks of St. Denis, in France, and St. Gildas de Ruys, in Bretagne, for the horrid incontinence of their lives, they joined his enemies, and assisted to embitter the life of this ingenious scholar; who, perhaps, was guilty of no other crime than that of feeling too fensibly an attachment to one who not only possessed the enchanting attractions of the softer sex, but, what indeed is very unusual, a congeniality of disposition, and an enthusiasm of imagination.

Is it, in heaven, a crime to love too well?"

It appears by a letter of Peter de Cluny to Eloisa, which Marville says, is amongst those of Abelard's, that she had solicited for his absolution; this Abbot gave it to her. It runs thus, Ego Petrus cluniacencis Abbas, qui Petrum Abælardum in monachum clunicluniasensem recepi, & corpus ejus surtim delatum Heloisse abbatisse & monialio Paracleti concessi, auctoritate omnipotentis Dei & omnium sanctorum absolvo eum pro ossicio ab omnibus peccatis suis.

In an ancient Chronicle of Tours, it is given as a fact, that when they deposed the body of the Abbess Eloisa in the tomb of her lover Peter Abelard, who had been there interred twenty years; this faithful husband raised his arms, stretched them. and closely embraced his beloved Eloisa. It is probable that this poetic fiction was invented to sanctify, by a miracle, the frailties of their youthful days. This is not wonderful; but it is strange, that Andrew Du Chesne, who has been honoured with the title of the Father of French History, and who, indeed, was a writer whose learning was equal to his great industry, relates this anecdote. And though it is only an absurd fable of the ancient chroniclers, he not only gives it as an incident well authenticated, but also maintains it's possibility, by various other examples; but which, unfortunately, are taken from similar authorities.

Bayle tells us, that billets doux and anorous verses are two powerful machines to employ in the assaults of Love; particularly when the passionate songs that the poetical lover composes are sung by himself. This secret was well known to the elegant Abelard. Abelard (says Bayle) so touched the sensible heart of Eloisa, and infused such fire into her frame, by employing his fine pen and his fine voice, that the poor woman never recovered from the attack. She herself informs us, that he displayed two qualities, which are rarely found in philosophers, and by which he could instantly win the affections of the female;—he wrote well, and he fung well. He composed love-verses so beautiful, and songs so agreeable, as well for the words as the airs, that all the world got them by heart, and the name of his mistress was spread from province to province.

ARISTOTLE AND PLATO.

Or all men of letters who have appeared, perhaps there never was one on whom so much praise and so much censure have been lavished as on Aristotle: but he had this advantage, of which some of the most eminent icholars have been deprived, that he enjoyed during his life a splendid reputa-Philip of Macedon must have felt a strong conviction of his merit, when he wrote to him in these terms, on the occasion of the birth of Alexander:—'I receive from the gods, this day, a son; but I thank them not so much for the favour of his birth, as his having come into the world in a time when you can have the care of his education; and that, through you, he will be rendered worthy of being my son.'

Diogenes Laertius describes the person of the Stagyrite, by informing us, that his eyes were little, and his legs lank; that he stammered, and was fond of a magnificent dress, and wore costly rings. He had a mistress whom whom he loved passionately, and for whom he frequently acted inconsistent with the philosophic character: a thing as common with philosophers as with other men.

Aristotle had studied under the divine Plato: but the disciple and the master could not possibly agree in their doctrines; they were of opposite tastes and talents. Plato was the chief of the Academic sect, and Aristotle of the Peripatetic. Plato, says the author of Querelles Litteraires, (a work which is supposed to have received many finishing strokes from the hand of Voltaire) was simple, modest, frugal, and of austere manners; a good friend, and a zealous citizen; but a very bad politician: a lover indeed of benevolence, and desirous of diffusing it amongst men, but knowing little of them; as chimerical in his ideas as Rousseau, or our Sir Thomas Moore in his Utopia.

Aristotle had nothing of the austerity of the philosopher: he was open, pleasant, and even charming in his conversation; fiery and volatile in his pleasures; magnificent in his dress. They describe him as fierce, disdainful, and sarcastic. He joined to a taste for profound erudition, that of an elegant Regant dissipation. His passion for luxury accasioned him such expences, when he was young, that he consumed all his property.

Rapin has sketched an ingenious parallel of these two celebrated philosophers. The works of this critic are now so little read, that the reader will not be displeased to find it here.

The genius of Plato is more polished, md that of Aristotle more vast and probund. Plato has a lively and abundant imagination; fertile in invention, in ideas, in expressions, and in figures; displaying a thousand different turns, a thousand new coours, all agreeable to their subject: but, ifter all, it is nothing more than imagination. Aristotle is hard and dry in all he says; but what he says is all reason, though it is expressed drily: his diction, pure as it is, has fomething uncommonly austere; and his obscurities, natural or affected, disgust and satigue his readers. Plato is equally delicate in his thoughts and in his expres-Aristotle, though he may be more natural, has not any delicacy: his style is simple and even, but close and nervous; that of Plato is grand and elevated, but loose and diffuse. Plato always says more than he should say: Aristotle never says enough, and leaves the reader always to think more than he says. The one surprises the mind, and charms it by a slowery and sparkling character: the other illuminates and instructs it, by a just and solid method. Plato communicates something of genius, by the secundity of his own; and Aristotle something of judgment and reason, by that impression of good sense which appears in all he says. In a word, Plato frequently only thinks to express himself well; and Aristotle only thinks, to think justly."

An interesting anecdote is related of these philosophers.—Aristotle became the rival of Plato. Literary disputes long subsisted betwixt them. The disciple ridiculed his master, and the master treated contemptuously his disciple. To make his superiority manifest, Aristotle wished for a regular disputation before an audience, where erudition and reason might prevail. But this satisfaction was depied.

Plato was always surrounded by his scholars, who took a lively interest in his glory. Three of these he taught to rival Aristotle; and and it became their mutual interest to depreciate his merits. Unfortunately, one day, Plato found himself in his school without these three favourite scholars. Aristotle flies to him: a crowd gathers, and enters with him. The idol whose oracles they wished to overturn was presented to them. He was then (says the Abbé Iraild) a respectable old man; the weight of whose years had enfeebled his memory. The combat was not long. Some sophisms made rapidly, embarrassed Plato. He saw himself furrounded by the inevitable traps of the subtlest logic; and he only answered by these words, which reproached his ancient scholar - He has kicked against us, as a colt against it's mother.'

Soon after this humiliating adventure, he ceased to give public lectures. Aristotle remained master in the sield of battle. He quickly raised a school, and devoted himself to render it the most famous one in Greece. But the three savourite scholars of Plato, zealous to avenge the cause of their master, and to make amends for their imprudence in having quitted him, armed themselves against the usurper. Xenocrates, the most ardent of the three, attacked Aristotle; confounded the logician, and re-established Plato in all his rights. Since that time the Academic and Peripatetic sects, animated by the spirits of their several chiefs, avowed an eternal hatred for each other.

MARTIN LUTHER AND CALVIN.

To oppose the Church of Rome in their idea of Prayers addressed to the Saints, Luther denied the immortality of the soul. He said it expired with the body, but that God revived both. So that, according to his opinion, no one could enter into the visible presence of God till this operation had taken place. The Romish Church holding a contrary opinion, he treated as impious what it inculcates concerning the immortality of the soul. These are dreadful shifts for men who pretend to act by an impulse of the Divinity!

Calvin was originally named Cauvin. His stipend, as minister at Geneva, was as mi-serable serable as the income of a Welch curate. He was subject to eleven different maladies, which, continually afflicting him, irritated his dispositions. He had, indeed, so much acerbity in his temper, that he became unsupportable to those who were near him. It was this that occasioned many Germans to say—' that they preferred being in hell with Beza, to being in paradife with Calvin.' Every day he taught theology, preached, and held various conferences; yet, in spite of all his occupations, he contrived to leave behind him, as an author, nine ponderous folios! He died at Geneva, in 1594, aged fifty-five. He was a learned man; but he has caused a world of woe. He strove ambitiously to overturn every thing. He was cruel and vindictive: he occasioned the persecution of Michael Servetus, who was so cruelly put to death in the name of a Christian Religion, and by the hands of men who profess Evangelical gentle-. ness; and all this for a difference about the Trinity!

Vol. I.

TERTULLIAN.

TERTULLIAN, a father of the Primitive Church, was an African. He is a most terrible author, and does not yield easily to the hand of the translator. He is all nerves; his pen pierces like a graver: his style would appear shocking to the present race of readers.

With him Discipline means the Rights of Religion; Faith, it's Theory; and God and Discipline, mean God and his Worship. He calls the Christians Little Fish, beçause they are regenerated in the waters of Baptism: those who are baptized, Candidates Baptismi; alluding to the White Robes the baptized wore till the succeeding Sunday, which was therefore called the White Sunday. This is furely burlesquing the rites of baptism. In this style are all his works composed; and there have been many writers on Sacred topics who greatly admire these flourishes of his pen. We may approve of their religious zeal, but not of their their taste in composition. Balzac, who pretends to be his admirer, gives a very ingenious reason for it: he says—'It must be confessed that his style is obscure; but that, like the richest ebony, through it's excess of darkness, it is bright.' An idle conceit, like this, offers but a weak apology for the desects of a writer.

Lactantius censures him for his inelegance and harshness.

Malebranche says, that—' his manner of writing dazzles the understanding; and that, like certain authors whose imaginations are vivid, he persuades us without the aid of reason. But he was a visionary, and destitute of judgment. His fire, his raptures, and his enthusiasm, upon the most trivial subjects, plainly indicate a disordered imagination. What hyperboles! What figures!'

Salmasius, the acutest commentator of the moderns, when he undertook to examine his writings, 'declared, that certainly no one ever shall understand him.

Yet this is one of the fathers who established Christianity; and I am pained to observe, that a candid criticism on so bad a N 2 writer writer will be looked upon as committing an impiety towards Christianity, by certain zealots of religion, who seem in their notions to be at least some centuries remote from the enlightened spirit of this age. let it be considered, that I presume not to decide on matters of religious faith, but only on those which concern the four-andtwenty letters of the Alphabet. Besides, we have so many other instances in men of all religions, who have proved very good faints, though they have been otherwise singularly illiterate. Inspiration has nothing to do with Knowledge. The Bible has little relation with the Cyclopædia. Whitefield and Wefley applied themselves to Literature, (so very mean were their abilities) we should not have heard of their But devoting themselves to Inspiration, they have been followed by thoufands of the Canaille.

MADEMOISELLE DE SCUDERY.

Bien heureux Scudery, dont la fertile plume Peut tous les mois sans peine enfanter un volume.

It is Boileau who has written the above couplet on the Scuderies, the brother and fister, both samous in their day for composing Romances, which they sometimes extended to ten or twelve volumes. It was the savourite literature of that period, as much as the Novels of the present times; or, to be more correct, of the present hour. Our nobility not infrequently condescended to translate these voluminous compositions.

The diminutive fize of our modern novels is undoubtedly an improvement; but, in resembling the fize of Primers, it were to be wished that their contents had also resembled their inossensive page. Our great grandmothers were incommoded with overgrown folios; and, instead of finishing the eventful history of two lovers at one or two sittings, it was sometimes six months, including Sundays, before they could get quit of their Clelias, their Cyrus's, and Parthenissas.

Mademoiselle Scudery, Menage informs us, had composed ninety volumes! the materials of which were entirely drawn from her own sertile invention. She had even sinished another Romance; but which she would not give the public, whose taste, she saw, no more relished these kinds of works.

'What a pleating description,' he elsewhere observes, ' has Mademoiselle Scudery made, in her Cyrus, of the Little Court at Rambouillet! There are a thousand things in the Romances of this learned lady that render them inestimable. She has drawn from the ancients their happiest passages, and has even improved upon them. Like the prince in the fable, whatever she touches becomes gold. We may read her works with great profit, if we possess a correct taste, and with to gather instruction. Those who censure their kngth, only shew the littleness of their judgment; as if Homer and Virgil were to be despited, because many of their books are filled with episodes and incidents that necessarily retard the conclu-

It does not require much penetration to observe, that Cyrus and Cleha are species of the Epic poem. The Epic must embrace a number of events to sufpend the course of the narrative; which only taking in a part of the life of the hero, would terminate too foon to discover the skill of the poet. Without this artifice, the charm of uniting the greater part of the Episodes to the principal subject of the Romance would be lost. Mademoiselle de Scudery has so well treated them, and so aptly introduced a variety of beautiful passage, that nothing in this kind is comparable to her productions. If we except some expressions, and certain turns, which have become somewhat obsolete, all the rest will last for ever, and outlive the criticisms they have undergone.'

Menage has here certainly uttered a false prophecy. Few know her Romances but by their names: and this critique must be allowed to be given rather in the spirit of friendship than of true criticism.

I shall add to this article the sentiments of a modern French writer, who has displayed great ingenuity in his strictures.

N 4 'The

'The misfortune of her having written too abundantly has occasioned an unjust contempt. We confess there are many heavy and tedious passages in her voluminous Romances; but if we consider that, in the Clelia and the Artamene, are to be found inimitable delicate touches, and many splendid parts which would do honour to some of our living writers, we must acknowledge that the great defects of all her works arise from her not writing in an age when taste had reached the acmé of cultivation which it now has. Such is her erudition, that the French place her next to the celebrated Madame Dacier. Her works, containing many secret intrigues of the court and city, her readers relished, on their early publication, more keenly than we can at present.'

Her Artamencs, or the great Cyrus, and principally her Clelia, are representations of what then passed at the court of France. The Map of the Kingdom of Tenderness in Clelia, appeared, at the time, to be the effect of the happiest invention. This celebrated map is an allegory which distinguishes the different kinds of tenderness, which are reduced to esteem, gratitude, and inclination, tion. It is thus the map represents three rivers, which have these three names, and on which are situated three towns, called Tenderness: Tenderness on Inclination; Tenderness on Esteem; and Tenderness on Gratitude. Pleasing Attentions, or Petit Soins, is a village very beautifully situated. Mademoiselle De Scudery was extremely vain of this little allegorical map; and had a terrible controversy with another writer about it's originality.

Some things similar are invented, I think, by Mrs. Barbauld; and a Scale of Health by Dr. Lettsom. Their ingenuity has given a value to these literary amusements.

THE SCALIGERS.

THE Man of Letters must confess—reluctantly, perhaps—that the literature which stores the head with so many ingenious restections, and so much admirable intelligence, may at the same time have little or no influence over the virtues of the heart.
The same vices, and the same follies, difgrace possessed a prosounder knowledge of the Grecian learning, or was, a more crudite critic, than Burman? Yet this man lived thobservant of every ordinary decency and moral duty. Who displayed more acuteness of mind, and a wider circle of literature, than the celebrated Scaligers? Yet, from the anecdotes and characters I collect of them, let the reader contemplate the men.

The two Scaligers, father and son, were two prodigies of learning and of vanity, Scioppius has tore the mask of that principality with which the father had adorned himself; for the elder Scaliger maintained, that he was descended from the La Scalas, princes of Verona.

Abbé Iraild, the anonymous author of a curious work, entitled 'Literary Quarrels,' (in which may be frequently traced the bold and lively touch of his patron, Voltaire) affords me some materials for an account of this singular controversy.

Joseph Scaliger inherited from his father, with an ardent love for study, the most ridiculous vanity, with a most caustic and most unsufferable humour. His writings are a mass of useful materials, and gross invectives against all those who would not acknowledge him to be the phænix of authors.

Intoxicated with the absurd panegyrics of his friends, he imagined that Nature had exhausted herself to produce him. He was a literary despot. He gloried in being conversant with thirteen languages, that is to say, he knew none. To the sury of his criticisin living and dead authors were alike sacrificed.

He gave, in 1594, a work under the title of 'A Letter from Joseph Scaliger, on the ' Antiquity and Splendour of the Scaligerian Race.' Whatever Pride in all it's delirium could imagine of extravagant and chimerical in genealogy, is collected in this writing. The author attempts to prove that his family descended from the ancient princes of Verona. The life of his father is the most curious morsel. Julius is represented as the greatest warrior of the age, because, in his youth, it happened he was reduced to serve as a common soldier in Italy; as the most skilful physician in Europe, because he had served in an apothecary's shop; as a better Latinist than Erasmus, and superior in every thing to Cardan, because he had been the avowed enemy of both. This monument, thus hastily reared to the glory of all the past and future Scaligers, appeared to Scioppius, who himself had some ridiculous pretensions of a similar nature, as an outrage to his own ideal family.

He immediately refuted the Letter from one end to the other: he even counted the lies it contains, and he very accurately tells us they amount to 499. He says, and he is now credited, that he was originally named Jules Burden; that he was born in the shop of a gilder; had passed some part of his life with a surgeon; and then became a cordelier. The elevation of his mind made him aspire to honours greater than these: he threw off his frock, and took the degree of Doctor in Physic at Paris. In this character he appeared at Venice, and in Pi. dmont. He there attached himself to a prelate of the noble House of Rovezza, and followed him to Agen, of which is patron was made bishop. He married the daughter of an apothecary. Such were the parents of Joseph Scaliger; who, finding this chimerical principality in his family, passed himself for a prince; and, to render the impositions of his father more credible, he added many of his own.

What an humiliation for Scaliger, to be attacked in so sensible a part. He directly sent forth a surious libel against his adversary: it is entitled 'The Life, and the Parents, of Gaspard Scioppius.' Never were blots in an escutcheon blacker. His sather was pictured as a man that had assumed a variety of shapes, but always of the meanest and roguish class: the good lady his mother was infamous; and he pursues, without mercy, his daughters, his sons, and his grand-children.

Scioppius (says the Abbé) crushed him in a volume, which will hardly find it's equal for foul abuse. It was written with such asperity, that (Baillet says) Scioppius was more to be dreaded than the hangman. This blow the dethroned Scaliger could never recover; and, as Menage observes of this work, he died of the chagrin he selt on the occasion of Scioppius's book being published, entitled "" Hypobolymæus."

'Yet we may, 'Lerves Huet, ' say, with Lipsius, that if the two Scaligers were not actually actually princes, they richly merited a principality, for the beauty of their genius and the extent of their erudition; but we can offer no apology for their ridiculous and singular haughtiness.

'When a friend was delineating his character, the father wrote to him in these terms—" Endeavour to collect whatever is most beautiful in the pages of Masinissa, of Xenophon, and of Plato, and you may then form a portrait which, however, will resemble me but impersectly."

Yet this man possessed little delicacy of taste, as he evinces by the salse judgments he passes on Homer and Musæus; and, above all, by those unformed and rude poems with which he has dishonoured Parnassus. Menage says, that the collection of Scaliger's poems, which forms a thick octavo volume, will hardly find it's equal for bad composition, considering them as the productions of a man of letters. Of a great number of epigrams, there are but sour or five which are in the least tolerable.

Huet thinks that his son composed those letters which pass under his name; and, as he is an exquisite judge of style, we should credit credit his opinion. But, though his poetry is so destitute of spirit or grace, his prose, it must be allowed, is excellent: nothing can be more noble, higher polished, or more happily turned.

The son possessed a finer taste: his style is more flowing and easy, and yet is not the less noble His writings, like those of the father, breathe fingular haughtiness and malignity. The Scaligerana will convince us that he was incapable of thinking or speaking favourably of any person. Although he has reflected bonour on his age by the extensiveness of his learning, we must confess that he has not feldom fallen into groß errors, even on those subjects to which he had most applied. As for instance, Chronology, which was his favourite study; and although he imagined that he stretched the sceptre over the realms of Criticism, no one has treated this topic with lefs felicity. was the reform of the Calendar then pending at Rome which engaged him in this Rudy. He wished to shew the world that he was more capable than all those who had been employed. If the fuccess of this labour had depended on the extent and variety of erudition, he had eminently surpassed all those who had applied to this task; but he was their inferior in the solidity of his judgment, in the exactness of his arguments, and the profundity of his speculations, When he fondly believed that he had found the Quadrature of the Circle, he was corrected, and turned into ridicule, by an obscure schoolmaster; who, having clearly pointed out the paralogism which deceived him, made his cyclometrics vanish at his touch.

Scaliger, the father, was,' fays Patin, an illustrious impostor. He had never been at any war, nor at any court of the Emperor Maximilian, as he pretended. He passed the first thirty years of his life in one continued study. Asterwards, he threw off his Monk's frock, and palmed on all Europe the singular imposition of his being a descendant of the princes of Verona, who bore the name of Scaliger.'

Julius Scaliger had this peculiarity in his manner of composition: he wrote with such accuracy, that his manuscript and the printed copy always corresponded page for page, and line for line. This may appear trifling inforinformation; but I am persuaded that a habit of correctness in the lesser parts of composition assists the higher.

I am pleased to find long after this was written, that the great Milton was very anxious for the correctness of his punctuation, and all other minutiæ of the press. So were Bayle, Balzac, Savage, Armstrong, and many other eminent writers.

George Pfalmanazar, well known in the literary world, exceeded in powers of deception any of the great impostors of learning. His Island of Formosa was an illusion eminently bold, and maintained with as much felicity as erudition; and vast must have been that erudition which could, on scientifick principles, form a language and it's grammar.

DE LA ROCHEFOUCAULT.

THE maxims of this noble author are in the hands of every one. To those who chuse to derive every motive and every action from the solitary principle of felf-love, Vol. I. O they they are inestimable. They form one continued satire on human nature; but they are not reconcileable to the seelings of him who trembles with the sensibilities of genius, or passes through life with the firm integrity of virtue.

The character of this author is thus given by Segrais—'The Duke de la Rochefou-cault had not studied; but he was endowed with a wonderful degree of discernment, and knew the world perfectly well. It was this that afforded him opportunities of making resections, and reducing into maximathose discoveries which he had made in the heart of man, of which he displayed an admirable knowledge.'

Chestersield, our English Rochesoucault, we are also informed, possessed an admirable knowledge of the heart of man; and he, too, has drawn a similar picture of human nature. These are two noble authors, whose chief studies seem to have been made in courts. May it not be possible, allowing these authors not to have written a sentence of apocrypha, that the fault lies not so much in human nature as in the nobility themselves?

MATTHEW PARIS.

A FRENCH critic has given this just and lively criticism on our historian—

Matthew Paris, an English Monk, is a good historian, if we except his Visions, and his Apparitions, with which his work is crouded. This is his worst side. But in those times, when they wrote history; it was as essential to recount a number of miracles, as it is in the present day to reject them; unless they are introduced to raise a laugh.

Matthew Paris is, however, sincere, and frank; and, without labouring at delineating the portraits of his heroes, he presents us with all the ideas which are necessary to be given. And this is more pleasing to me, than that vile affectation of continually drawing elaborate portraits; the great number of which disgust, and render the veracity of the author frequently suspected:

Will not this last censure fall heavy on the characters which Smollet has given us at the conclusion of every reign of our monarchs? Does not the author more frequently delineate the image of Imagination, than that of historic Truth?

THE NUMERAL FIGURES.

THE Numeral Figures, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, which we now employ, began to be made use of, in Europe, for the first time, in 1240, in the Alphonsean Tables, made by the order of Alphonso, son of Ferdinand, King of Castile; who employed, for this purpose, Isaac Hazan, a Jew singer, of the Synagogue of Toledo; and Abel Ragel, an Arabian. The Arabs took them from the Indians, in 900. The other Eastern nations received them through the means of the Spaniards, in a short time after their invasions. The first Greek who made use of them, was Plenudes, in a work dedicated to Michael Paleologus, in 1270; so that the Greeks had them not from the Arabs, but the Latins.

These cyphers, in the indexes of French books, are frequently called Arabic cyphers, to distinguish them from Roman numerals. Dr. Wallis is of opinion, that they became generally used in England about the year 1130. This account is disputable.

THE ARABIC CHRONICLE.

THE Arabic Chronicle of Jerusalem is only valuable from the time of Mahomet. For such is the stupid superstition of the Arabs, that they pride themselves on being ignorant of whatever has passed before the mission of their Prophet. The most curious information it contains, is concerning the Croisades. The Abbé de Longerue has translated several parts. He who would be versed in the history of the Croisades, should attend to this chronicle. It seems to have been written with impartiality. It renders justice to the Christian heroes, and particularly dwells on the gallant actions of the Count de Saint Gilles.

What seems worthy of observation, our historians chiefly write concerning Godfrey de Bouillon; only the learned know that the Count de Saint Gilles acted there so important a character. The stories of the Saracens are just the reverse: they speak little concerning Godfrey, and eminently distinguish Saint Gilles.

Tasso has given into the more vulgar accounts, by making the former so eminent, at the cost of the other heroes, in his Jerusalem Delivered. It was thus that Virgil transformed, by his magical power, the chaste Dido into a lover; and Homer, the meretricious Penelope into a moaning matron. It is not requisite for poets to be historians; but I wish that historians would not be segmently poets.

PRIOR'S HANS CARVEL.

The story of the Ring of Hans Carvel which Fontaine has so prettily set off, and Prior has with such gaiety and freedom related, is yet of very ancient standing; but it has proved so much a favourite, that a number of authors have employed it. Menage nage says, that Poggius, who died in 1459, has the merit of it's invention.

Rabelais, who has given it in his peculiar manner, changed it's original name of Philelphus, to that of Hans Carvel.

This tale will also be found in the elewenth of the One Hundred New Novels collected in 1461.

Ariosto has borrowed it, at the end of his fifth Satire; but, by his pleasant manner of relating it, we must confess it is fairly appropriated.

An anonymous writer, who published a Collection of Novels, at Lyons, in 1555, has also employed it in his eleventh Novel.

Cellio Melespini has it again in page 288 of the Second Part of his Two Hundred Novels, printed at Venice in 1609.

Fontaine, and an anonymous writer who has composed it in Latin Anacreontic verses, have considered it to be a subject worthy of their pens; and, at length, our Prior has given it to us in his best manner: so that I may venture to predict that, after Ariosto, La Fontaine, and Prior, he who again attempts it in the politer languages, will partake the dishonourable sate of Icarus.

O 4 Voltaire,

Voltaire, in one of his Literary Miscellanies, has a curious Essay, to shew that most of our best modern stories and plots originally belonged to the Eastern Nations. The Amphitrion of Moliere, was an imitation of Plautus, who had borrowed it from the Greeks, who had taken it from the Indians. It is given by Dow in his History of Hindostan.—The Ephesian Matron, versified by La Fontaine, was borrowed from the Italians; it is to be found in Petronius, and Petronius had it from the Greeks. But where (says he) did the Greeks find it? In the Arabian Tales. And from whence did the Arabian Fabulists borrow it? From the Chinese. And indeed it is to be found in Du Halde, who collected it from the Versions of the Jesuits.

If we were thus nicely to investigate the genealogy of our best modern stories, we should often discover their illegitimate birth.

THE ATHENIAN TRIBUNAL FOR DRA-MATIC COMPOSITION.

THE Athenians established a Tribunal, composed of five judges, to give their verdict on the merits of Compositions destined for the Theatre, and to decide if they deferved a public representation. The Romans had a similar tribunal.

To give an instance of the critical severity of these judges—They even arraigned at their bar Euripides, to make his defence for having permitted one of his dramatic characters impiously to say—'That he had made a vow with his tongue to the gods, but not with the intention of performing it.' Euripides desended himself, by supplicating the critics patiently to wait till the conclusion of the piece, when they would see that character broken on the wheel.

If such a Tribunal of Criticism was established at London, it would render the stage more instructive than it is at present; we might probably have sewer wretched operas; such vapours of wit, and dregs of the imagination, would be purged away from the purity of dramatic composition.

THE FLORENCE PROFESSOR.

AT Florence they have established a Professor, chosen from amongst the most eminent of the Della Crusca Academicians, who professes publicly the Italian language. It was thus, also, the Romans established a similar Student, who dedicated his life to the profession of their language.

I cannot but wish that an Academy, or at least a Professors, were founded in England, for the preservation of our language: they might censure any faulty innovations which appeared in the style of those compositions which were likely to become extensive in their circulation. They might detect the tinsel of Della Crusca, the Gallicisms of Gibbon, and the Scotticisms of Blair, on their earliest publication. They would compel our authors to be more vigilant.

lant; and we might thus be enabled to leave our heirs the rich inheritance of a classical style, who, in their gratitude, would recompense our labours, by delivering it down to posterity uncontaminated.

Swift, and other good judges of the purity of the English language, have testified their desire for such an establishment; and, although I have not forgotten the sentiments of Johnson on this occasion, I cannot but oppose them. Had there been such an Academy, or Professorship, founded in the days the Rambler was published, posterity would have read as many protests against the pedantic Latinity of his English as there are papers in that work. He seems to have been sensible, though somewhat late, of his error; for his biographical style is, indeed, a classical standard of the English language. It was then he most cordially praised the Addisonian periods. Akenside has committed the same violations in verse which Johnson has in prose.

THE STUDENT IN THE METROPOLIS.

A Man of Letters, who is more intent on the acquisitions of literature than on the plots of politics, or the speculations of commerce, will find a deeper solitude in a populous metropolis than if he had retreated to the seclusion of the country. The Student, as he does not flatter the malevolent passions of men, will not be much incommoded with their presence. A letter which Descartes wrote to Balzac-who, incapable. as he found his great soul to bend to the servilities of the courtier, was preparing to retire from court—will illustrate these sentiments with great force and vivacity. Defcartes then resided in the commercial city of Amsterdam; and thus writes to Balzac-

You wish to retire; and your intention is to seek the solitude of the Chartreux, or, possibly, some of the most beautiful provinces of France and Italy. I would rather advise you, if you wish to observe mankind, and and at the same time to be plunged into the deepest solitude, to join me in Amsterdam. I prefer this situation to that even of your delicious villa, where I spent so great a part of the last year: for, however agreeable a country-house may be, a thousand little conveniences are wanted. which can only be found in a city. One is not alone so frequently in the country as one could wish: a number of impertinent visitors are continually besieging you. Here, as all the world, except myself, is occupied in commerce, it depends merely on myself to live unknown to the world. I walk, every day, amongst immense ranks of people, with as much tranquillity as you do in your green alleys. The men I meet with make the same impression on my mind as would the trees of your forests, or the flocks of sheep grazing on your common. The busy hum, too, of these merchants, does not disturb one more than the purling of your brooks. If sometimes I amuse myself in contemplating their anxious motions, I receive the same pleasure which you do in observing those men who cultivate your land; for I reflect, that the end of all their labours labours is to embellish the city which I in habit, and to anticipate all my wants. If you see with delight the fruits of your orchards, which promise you such rich crops, do you think I feel less in observing so many sleets, that convey to me the productions of either India? What spot on earth could you find, which, like this, can so interest your vanity, and gratify your taste?"

GUY PATIN.

GUY PATIN was an author who made much noise in his time: but, like many others of this kind, posterity, more temperate, as less interested in the scandal of the day, will not allow pertness to be wit, and multifarious anecdote, learning. We, as Englishmen, must peculiarly feel our indignation kindle at the strictures which I shall notice; and which, garbage, as they are, have been hashed up by D'Argens, Voltaire, and many a French literary Cuisinier.

The work, for which he gained so much unmerited applause, consists of three volumes of letters, which were written to his friends in a familiar style, replete with the anecdotes of the day—a kind of newspaper, rather than an epistolary correspondence; and, like a newspaper, since time has commented on it's text, it will be found that the greater part of these anecdotes is false and malicious. They were read, however, with great avidity: but this criticism of Menage will be found to be just—

The Letters of Guy Patin are replete with falshoods. Mr. Bigot and I have detected some in every page. He was not careful in what he wrote, and he took every thing as it came.'

'These Letters,' says Voltaire, 'were read eagerly, because they contained anecdotes of such things as every body likes, and satires which are liked still more. They shew what uncertain guides in history those writers are, who inconsiderately set down the news of the day. Such accounts are frequently salse, or perverted by the malice of mankind.'

Bayle, in criticiling them, observes—'It is proper the reader should know all the witty sayings and stories he relates are not true.

true. There are some places, wherein he shews a terrible malice, and a prodigious boldness, in giving a criminal turn to every thing.'

This language is indeed forcible; it is certainly just. The reader may judge by the extract I now make out of the Patiniana, page 17. It was written when Salmasius finished his Defence of King Charles, which was so nervously answered by Milton.

The book of Mr. Salmasius, written for the defence of the King of England, is now. printed at Leyden, in French, and in La-This apology for a king, who has. been beheaded by his people, is a delicate subject, and will not please every body. The English, who are the worst, the most. cruel, and the most persidious of people, pretend that they are countenanced by their religion, and the political law; but Religio non fert Parricidas, Ecclesia nescit Sanguinem. The most refined politics do not go so far as to dare to punish kings, like other malefactors, by the hand of the common hangman. The grandfather of this monarch was strangled by the Puritans of Scot-. land. His grandmother, Mary Stuart, was. beheaded beheaded in England, in the year 1587, by the command of Queen Elizabeth. I, who naturally hate the English, cannot but shudder with horror when I think of this nation.'

I shall say nothing on this extraordinary passage; but only remark that, though all this passed so near the times in which Patin lived, he has committed, in this short extract, a gross historical blunder, as Mr. James Petit Andrews has detected; to whose labours I take this opportunity of acknowledging myself indebted for much pleasurable information.

It has been a custom to echo amongst the Gallic writers, that the English nation are of the race

'-of the Cannibals that each other eat,
The Anthropophagi---'

The very executions of our malefactors at Tyburn have been urged as a proof. Hear Voltaire—

There have been sanguinary times in all nations; but, amongst the English, more illustrious men have been brought to the block than in all Europe besides. It was Vol. I.

the character of this nation to commit legal murders. The gates of London have been infected with human heads fixed to the walls.'

D'Argens, in his Philosophical Visions, has given the character of the English nation, under the name of the Libertines, in the second Vision. The passage is too long to be quoted; but the power of his pencil seems not inferior to that of the lively Volutaire's in drawing our portrait with a vermillion hue. 'Monsters!' as Shakespeare says,

Do grow beneath their shoulders!'----

He says, that a civil war is our delight, and the beheading a monarch our amusement. This hardly deserves the name of wit; it is certainly destitute of truth. I have, not infrequently, thought that these lively and facetious writers (for surely they did not mean to be serious) are ignorant of their own history: no improbable circumstance with those who probably have written nearly as many books as they have read. I maintain, that France has known more sanguinary guinary periods than England; and that more of their kings than of our own have come to an untimely end. Let us recollect the affaffinations of Henry the Third and Fourth; the reigns of Henry the Second and Charles the Fourth; Louis the Thirteenth and Fourteenth; and let all the efforts of all the Patins produce a massacre in England so dreadful as that of St. Bartholomew in France!

THE TALMUD AND GEMARA.

THE Talmud is a collection of Jewish Traditions, which had been orally preserved. It comprizes the Mishna, which is the text; and the Gemara, it's commentary. It is a compleat system of the barbarous learning of the Jews. They have persuaded themselves, that these traditional explications are of a Divine origin: for they tell us, that the Pentateuch was written out by their legislator before his death; that the number of copies was thirteen, one for each tribe, and the remaining one was deposited in the

Ark. That the Oral Law 'was what Moses continually taught, in his Sanhedrim, to the Elders, and the rest of the people;' the mode of which, honest David Levi informs us, was thus—

'As soon as Moses was returned to his tent from receiving the words of God, he called Aaron thither unto him, and first delivered unto him the Text, which was to be the Written Law; and after that, the interpretation of it, which was the Oral Law, in the same order as he received both from God in the Mount. Then Aaron arising, and seating himself at the right-hand of Moses, Eleazar, and Ithamar, his sons went in the next; and being taught both these Laws at the feet of the Prophet, in the same manner as Aaron had been, they also arose and seated themselves; and then the Seventy Elders, who constituted the Sanhedrim, or Great Senate of the nation; and then entered all fuch of the people as were desirous of knowing the word of God.

He then informs us that Moses, Aaron, his sons, and the Elders, made the same repetition before they withdrew—'So that the people having heard both these Laws repeated to them four times, they all had it thereby firmly fixed in their memories; but the interpretation thereof was to be delivered down, only by word of mouth, to the succeeding generations, for which no reason is alledged.

It appears afterwards, that at the end of the 40th year of their flight from Egypt, the memory of the people became treacherous, and Moses was constrained to repeat, occasionally, this same Oral Law; which (if it is not profane to say) had been much better written, as the Pentateuch was.

This history of the Talmud some may be inclined to suppose apocryphal. It appears that the Talmud was compiled by certain Jewish doctors, who were solicited for this purpose by their nation, that they might have something to oppose to their Christian adversaries. These doctors were descendants of the Ten Tribes of Israel, who were led into captivity by king Salmanazar, father of Sennacherib, in the reign of King Hosea. This book is a mixture of the Syriac, the Hebrew, and the vulgar Hebrew, which was the language spoken in the schools of the Rabbins, and which differs as linus from the other, as the Latin of Bartolinus from that of Cicero. This work contains nothing that is valuable, but a very heavy load of pious absurdities, of insipid stories, and palpable contradictions. The only apology that has been made for these extravagancies and idle sictions, is, that after the completion of the Talmud, those who succeeded in the schools are distinguished by the name of Opinionists, and not by that of Doslors; and that no Jew is compelled to receive them as matters of saith, although we are informed that this work originated (as we have already observed) from the Divinity itself.

Chevreau, in his History of the World, affords us a satisfactory account of the contents of this work. I shall give an abstract of his Analysis.

There are two Talmuds; the Jerusalem and the Babylonian. The last is the most esteemed, because it is the most bulky. It contains the oral traditions from the time of Moses, to Rabbi Jehuda Hakkodosh, an industrious young man, called the Prince of the Rabbins, because he most carefully collected their Reveries. This work is divided into into fix parts, of which every one which is entitled Order, is formed of Treatises: every Treatise is divided into Chapters, and every Chapter into Mishnas, or Aphorisms. In the first part, is discussed whatever relates to Seeds, Fruits, and Trees. In the second, Feasts. In the third, Women, their Duties, their Disorders, Marriages, Divorces, Contracts, and Nuptials. In the fourth, are treated the Damages or Losses sustained by Beasts or Men; of Things found; Deposits; Usuries; Rents; Farms; Partnerships in Commerce; Inheritance; Sales and Purchases; Oaths; Witnesses; Arrests; Idolatry; and here are named those by whom the Oral Law was received and preserved. the fifth part, are noticed what regard Sacrifices and boly things: and the fixth treats on Purifications; Vessels; Furniture; Cloaths; Houses; Leprosy; Baths, and numerous other articles. All this forms the MISHNA.

This account from Chevreau is very accurate. I have compared it with the ampler analysis of David Levi. I refer the reader to a publication of the last writer, which has for title, 'A succinct Account of the Rites and Ceremonies of the Jews, &c. By David P 4 Levi.'

Levi.' This work is the only satisfactory one in our language, though very inferior to Leo de Modena. If allowance is made for the author's inexperience in literature, his integrity will be found highly commendable; and an honest man is superior to a fine writer. But why insist on the divine origin of the Talmud?

The GEMARA, that is, the Accomplishment or Perfection, contains the DISPUTES and the OPINIONS of the RABBINS on the oral traditions. Their last decisions. Elucidating absurdaties by other absurdaties! Chevreau writes, that the Jews have such veneration for this ridiculous compilement, that they compare the holy writings to warter; the Talmud to wine; the text of Moses to pepper; the Talmud to aromatics. They also tell us, that of the twelve hours of which the day is composed, God employs nine to study the Talmud, and only three to read the written Law!

As the reader may be curious to know one of these Rabbinical Reveries, I have compiled some notices which they have given concerning Adam.

Adam's body was made of the earth of Babylon,

Babylon, his bead of the land of Israel, his other members of other parts of the world. R. Meir thought he was compact of the earth gathered out of the whole earth; as it is written—Thine eyes did see my substance. Now it is elsewhere written—The eyes of the Lord are over all the earth. R. Aha expressly marks the twelve hours in which his various parts were formed. His stature was from one end of the world to the other; and it was for his transgression that the Creator, laying his hand in anger on him, lessened him; for before, (says R. Eleazer) with his hand he reached the firmament. R. Jehuda thinks his fin was herefy; but R. Isaac thinks (as my author expresses it) that, 'it was nourishing his foreskin.'

They farther inform us, that he was an Hermaphrodite, having both sexes, and a double body: the semale parts joined at the shoulders and back parts to the male; their countenances turned from each other. And this they prove by Moses saying—' So God created man in his image, male and semale created he them, and he called their name ADAM.' Adam, being solitary, cut himself in two, (a hint this to the Managers for their panto-pantomimes) and found himself fitted for procreation. Leo Hebræus thus reconciles the fable of Plato's Androgynus with the narration of Moses, from which he thinks it is borrowed. Plato relates, that Jupiter, in the first forming of mankind, made them such androgini, with two bodies, of two sexes joined in the breast, which he divided for their pride, the navel still remaining as a scar of the wound then made.

This article may be sufficient to satisfe the reader with a perusal of the Talmud. Obe, jam satis est! For his farther satisfaction, I refer him to Basnage's Histoire des Juiss, tome IV. p. 1323.

CARDINAL RICHELIEU.

The present ancedote concerning Cardinal Richelieu, may serve to teach the man of letters how he deals out Criticisms to the Great, when they ask his opinion of manuferipts, be they in verse or prose.

The cardinal placed in a gallery of his palace the portraits of several illustrious men.

men. Among them was Blaise de Montluc, Mareschal of France. He was desirous of composing the inscriptions which were to be placed round the portraits. That which he intended for Montluc was conceived in these terms: Multa fecit, Plura scripsit, Vir tamen, Magnus fuit. He shewed it without mentioning the author to Bourbon, the Royal Professor in Greek, and asked his opinion concerning it. Having read it, he expressed his dislike in warm terms, and thought it was Latin much in the style of the Breviary; and, if it had concluded with an Allelujab, it would serve for an Anthem to the Magnificat. The cardinal agreed with the severity of his strictures; and acknowledged the discernment of the professor; 'for,' he said, ' it is really written by a priest.' But, however he might approve of Bourbon's critical powers, he punished without mercy his ingenuity. The pension his majesty had bestowed on him was withheld the next year.

The cardinal was one of those ambitious men, who foolishly aspire to excel in whatever a true Genius is most excellent; and, because he saw himself constantly disappointed, pointed, he envied, with all the venom of rancour, those talents which are so frequently all that men of genius possess.

Here are two interesting anecdotes—He was jealous of Balzac, because his reputation became so splendid: he even offered the elder Heinsius ten thousand crowns to write a Criticism which should ridicule his elaborate compositions. This Heinsius resused, because Salmasius threatened to revenge Balzac on his Herodes Infanticida.

He attempted to rival the reputation of Corneille's Cid, by opposing to it one of the most ridiculous productions that was ever exhibited in the theatre. It was an allegorical tragedy, in which the minister had congregated the four quarters of the world. A great deal of political matter was thrown together, divided into scenes and acts. When he first sent it anonymously to the French Academy, it was reprobated. He then tore it in rage, and scattered it about his study. Towards evening, like another Medea lamenting over the members of her own children, he and his secretary passed the night in uniting the scattered limbs. He then ventured to avow himself; and, having having pretended to correct this incorrigible tragedy, the submissive Academy retracted their censures—but the Public pronounced it's melancholy sate, on it's first representation. This was the tragedy which was intended to thwart Corneille's Cid. Enraged at it's success, Richelieu even commanded the Academy to publish an abusive Critique of it, which is well known in French literature. Boileau, on this occasion, has these two well turned verses—

En vain contre le Cid, un Ministre se ligue;
Tout Paris, pour Chimene, a les yeux de Rodrigue.

T' oppose the Cid, in vain the Statesman tries;
All Paris, for Chimene, has Rodrigue's eyes.

It is said, that it is owing to the i'l success of this tragedy that custom is derived, which the French have, of securing a number of friends to applaud their pieces at their first representations. In the Recherches sur le Theatre, p. 142, I find the following droll anecdote concerning this droll tragedy.

The minister, after the ill success of his tragedy, retired, unaccompanied, the same evening, to his country-house at Ruel. He then sent for his favourite Desmarests, who was at supper with his friend Petit. Desmarests conjecturing that the interview would be stormy, begged his friend to accompany him.

Well! faid the cardinal, as foon as he saw them, the French will never posses a taste for what is excellent: they seem not to have relished my tragedy. My lord, answered Petit, it is not the fault of the piece, which is so admirable, but that of the players. Did not your Eminence perceive, that not only they knew not their parts, but that they were all drunk? Really, replied the cardinal, something pleased, I observed they acted it dreadfully ill.

When Desmarists and Petit returned to Paris, they did not fail going to the players, to plan a new mode of performance, which was to secure a number of spectators; so that at the second representation bursts of applause were frequently heard!

Richelieu had another fingular vanity of closely imitating Cardinal Ximenes. Pliny was not a more servile imitator of Cicero. Marville tells us, that, like Ximenes, he placed himself at the head of an army; like him, him, he degraded princes and nobles; and like him, rendered himself formidable to all Europe. And because Ximenes had established schools of Theology, Richelieu undertook likewise to raise again the schools of the Sorbonne. And, to conclude, as Ximenes had written several theological treatises, our cardinal was also desirous of leaving posterity various polemical works.

Cardinal Richelieu had certainly an uncommon genius for politics. Many inflances might be given. I shall notice two. Sir William Temple observes, that he inflituted the French Academy to give employment to the wits, and to hinder them from inspecting too narrowly into his politics, and his administration. It is believed that the Mareschal de Grammont lost an important battle by the orders of the cardinal, that, in this critical conjuncture of affairs, his majesty (who was inclined to dismiss him) could not then absolutely do without him.

These anecdotes will serve to shew, to what a degree of self-opinion Vanity may level a great man. He who would attempt to display universal excellence, will probably bly be disappointed; it is certain he will be impelled to practise meannesses, and to act sollies, which, if he has the least sensibility, must occasion him many a pang, and many a blush.

THE PLINIES.

PLINY was by much too bold to advance, in his Natural History, lib. 7. cap. 35. that the soul is not immortal. This is a dreadful sentiment to be desseminated throughout a state; for, if this principle is established, the good will no more hope for a recompence of their miseries, nor the bad dread a punishment for their crimes.

To deny the immortality of the foul (as Mr. Monnoye observes) was not, in the days of Pliny, so bold an opinion as it would be now. It was then allowed to follow the opinions of Epicurus, who believed in the mortality of the soul; and Lucretius, in his celebrated poem, establishes this doctrine. Seneca, stoic as he was, anticipates, in serveral veral passages of his works, the sentiment and even the expressions of Pliny.

Pliny was certainly a man of irreproachable character: but the truth is, that, like most of the Romans, he aspired to glory, by shewing that he could be an honest man without the hope of any suture reward. The sentiment is noble; but let it be confined to the narrow circle of speculative philosophy.

Pliny, to express at the same time the invention and the malice of men, says, in writing on Arrows, that they have given wings to iron, and taught it to fly like a bird—had he even added, like a ravenous vulture, perhaps it might have heightened this poetical image. Had he lived when gunpowder, fire-arms, and bombs, were invented, what metaphors could the philosopher have found to equal his indignation! Ariosto and Milton have satirized this diabolical machinery, when they gave them to be employed by the demons.

The elder Pliny, who was so intimately acquainted with the human heart, says, on the subject of Grystal Vases, that their fragility enhances their price; and that it is the Val. I. Q boast boast of Luxury to make use of things that may, at the slightest blow, entirely perish.

The Younger Pliny has given (a French wit observes) so exact a description of his house, that it looks as if he wished to dispose of it. Men of taste are fond of perpetuating those scenes which their lives have been passed in embellishing.

This writer has given us this admirable fentiment—That He is a good man, and of strict morals, who pardons every one, as if he himself committed faults every day; and yet, who endeavours to abstain from them, as if he pardoned no one.

Pliny the younger was a servile imitator of Cicero, (whom indeed he adored) even in the minutest occurrences of life. This we may trace throughout his elegant epistles. In the thirty-third letter of the seventh book he intreats Tacitus, his friend, to notice him in his history. This favour he had before asked, in the sixteenth letter of the sixth book. A similar mode of proceeding was practised by Cicero. This great orator, in one of his letters, had the excessive vanity of writing to Lucceius, to direct him in what manner he should mention him: and he begs him, that, in his annals, he would. referve an entire volume for his consulship! Whatever may be the vanity of the moderns, they appear to have more art than the ancients in disguising it.

INNOVATION.

To an ingenious friend I am indebted for the present, and two subsequent articles.

The following short extract from a French writer, about the year 1500, may serve to shew, that the cry against Innovation is not peculiar to the clergy of the present day, even against the opinions of the most moderate amongst their own body.

Such persons were the brave bishops of the Lionnois, who assembled a Synod to reform the regulations of Saint Anthony in that province. The Monks of that place were distinguished by the title of the Hogs of Saint Anthony: they afflicted themselves with the pains of making eight repasts in one day, to shew the weakness of Human Nature!

There were some Jesuits, and some young bishops, who made fine harangues, and long ones too to demonstrate that such constitutions admit of change, habita ratione temporum: that what our ancestors had done with a good intention, was, at this day, ridiculous. But to all these reasons the sub-prior of Saint Anthony only replied, snoring, with this grave and remarkable sentence—Let us keep ourselves, in our time, from novelties.

The contest was renewed with vigour on the other side: but the sub-prior, with his triple chin, persisted in the same argument; stammering out—Let us keep—let us keep—keep ourselves—&c.

However filly this reply of our well-fed, prior may seem, it is the same which has now the force to resist all the salutary reforms which Reason and Good-sense so loud-ly call for in Institutions, not only rendered obsolete by Time, but desective and unjust in their original principles. It is the same grave and unmeaning exclamation, which, from the mouth of a senator, obstructs an equal.

equal representation; and, from that of an archbishop, a revival of articles, which sew can believe, though so many are bound to profess.

Mudge, a writer of different principles from the communicator of this article, has described the evils of anarchy, in a sermon on that subject, by the following admirable sigure—when Innovation becomes Anarchy, the similitude is just. Every man projected and reformed, and did what was right in his own eyes. No image can better express such a condition, than that of a dead animal in a state of putrefaction; when instead of one noble creature, as it was when his held it together, there are ten thousand little nauseous reptiles growing out of it, every one crawling in a path of it's own.

ON THE CUSTOM OF SALUTING AFTER SNEEZING.

Some Catholics—says Father Feyjoo—have attributed the origin of this custom to the ordinance of a pope—Saint Gregory—Q3 who who is said to have instituted a short prayer to be used on such occasions, at a time when a pestilence raged; the crisis of which was attended by sneezing, and, in most cases, followed by death.

The Rabbins have a tale, that, before Jacob, men never sneezed but once, and then immediately died: but that that Patriarch obtained the revocation of this law; the memory of which was ordered to be preserved in all nations, by a command of every prince to his subjects to employ some salutary exclamation after the act of sneezing.

These accounts are, probably, alike fabulous; the pious sictions of pious men; both because—continues Feyjoo—the enquiries of Aristotle concerning this strange circumstance, and the allusions to it in Apuleius, Petronius, Pliny, and others, prove it to have existed many ages prior to Saint Gregory; and it is related, in a Memoir of the French Academy of Sciences, to have been found practised in the New World, on the sirst discovery of America. This is not only said to be a fact, but some writers also give us an amusing account of the ceremonies which which attend the sneezing of a King of Monomotapa—Those who are near his person, when this happens, salute him in so loud a tone, that those who are in the antichamber hear it, and join in the acclamation. Those who are in the adjoining apartments do the same, until the noise reaches the street, and becomes propagated throughout the city: so that, at each sneeze of his majesty, results a most horrid cry from the salutations of many thousands of his vassals.

That a custom, so universally prevalent, should have no plausible reason to support it, is rather curious.

To this may be added, the ridiculous reason given by Aristotle why we sneeze twice, once after another. It is, he says, because we have two nostrils! This is, as Menage observes, as ill imagined, as when he takes comets for exhalations.

BONAVENTURE DE PERIERS.

A HAPPY art in the relation of a story, is, doubtless, a very agreeable talent—it has Q4 obtained

bre de la Royne de Navarre, of whom the French have a little Volume of Tales, in prose, is, in my opinion, not inserior to him in the facility and sportiveness of his vein. His style is now, in many places, obsolete; neither could we, frequently, discover his sense, without the aid of his ingenious commentators; particularly M. de la Monnoye; from whose edition, in three volumes, I have extracted the following short anecdote, not as the best specimen of our scarce author, but as it introduces a novel etymology of a word in great use.

A student at law, who studied at Poitiers, had tolerably improved himself in cases of equity; not that he was overburthened with learning, but his chief desiciency was a want of assurance and considence to display his knowledge. His father passing by Poitiers, recommended him to read aloud, and to render his memory more prompt by a continued exercise. To obey the injunctions of his father, he determined to read at the Ministery. In-order to obtain a certain assurance, he went every day into a garden, which was a very secret spot, being at a distance from any house, and where there grew a great number of fine large cabbages. Thus, for a long time, as he pursued his studies, he went to repeat his lesson to these cabbages, addressing them by the title of Gentlemen; and dealing out his sentences, as if they had composed an audience of scholars at a lecture. After having prepared himself thus for a fortnight or three weeks, he began to think it was high time to take the chair; imagining that he should be able to harangue the scholars, as well as he had before done his cabbages. He comes forward, he begins his oration but, before he had said a dozen words, he remained dumb, and became so confused, that he knew not where he was: so that all he_could bring out was-Domini, Ego bene video quod non estis caules: that is to say for there are some who will have every thing in plain English-Gentlemen, I now clearly see you are not cabbages. In the garden, he could conceive the cabbages to be scholars; but, but, in the chair, he could not conceive the fcholars to be cabbages.

The hall of the School of Equity, at Poitiers, where the institutes were read, was called Ea Ministerie. On which head, Florimond de Remond, (book vii. ch. 11.) speaking of Albert Babinot, one of the first disciples of Calvin, after having said he was called 'The good man,' adds, that, because he had been a Student of the Institutes at this Ministerie of Poitiers, Calvin, and others, stilled him Mr. Minister; from whence, afterwards, Calvin took occasion to give the name of MINISTERS to the pastors of his, church,

DE THOU.

De Thou is the Livy of the French nation. I will not dwell on the purity and the elegance of his style, his deep penetration into the mysteries of the cabinets of princes, nor on his accuracy, his impartiality, and, in a word, his historic excellence. I refer the the reader, for a character of this historian, to a paper in the Essays of the ingenious Mr. Knox. I offer only a trait of his eloquence; which, at once, shews the man was not less amiable than the bistorian was admirable.

'How much,' exclaims Bourbon, 'does the perusal of the History of the President De Thou make a reader with, if he is possessed of a feeling heart, fervidly to with, to meet in his friend a soul like his! He preserved inviolable the ties of friendship. Attentive to fill the duties which it exacts, he did not only render all the services he could to his friends, but he fought every occasion to distinguish them by praise; and he did this with such an effusion of tender sentiment, and ingenuous ardour, that Envy herself could not take offence at the eulogiums of a rival. After having filled a page with the praises of Pierre Pithou, he closes his eulogium by adding, that he would fay more—if he was not his friend!'

THE MONK TURNED AUTHOR.

THE prior of one of the most celebrated Convents in Paris had reiteratedly intreated Varillas, the historian, to examine a work composed by one of his Monks; and of which—not being himself addicted to letters—he wished to be governed by his opinion. Varillas at length yielded to the entreaties of the prior; and, to regale the critic, they laid on two tables, for his inspection, Seven enormous Volumes in Folio!!

This rather disheartened our reviewer: but greater was his astonishment, when, having opened the first volume, he found it's title to be, Summa Dei-paræ; and, as Saint Thomas had made a Sum, or System of Theology, so our Monk had formed a Sum of the Virgin! He immediately comprehended the design of our good father, who had laboured on this work full Thirty Years, and who boasted he had treated Three Thou-sand Questions concerning the Virgin; of which, he stattered himself, not a single one had had ever yet been imagined by any one but himself!

Perhaps, a more extraordinary design was never known. Varillas, pressed to give his judgment on this work, advised the prior, with great prudence and good-nature, to amuse the honest old Monk with the hope of printing these Seven Folios, but always to start some new difficulties; for it would be inhuman to give so deep a chagrin to a man who had reached his 74th year, as to inform him of the nature of his favourite occupations; and that, after his death, he should throw the volumes into the fire.

GROTIUS.

THE Life of Grotius has been written by De Burigny.

The following anecdotes I select, because they appear interesting, and form a biographic sketch, which instructs the mind. They shew the singular selicity of a man of letters having a father who promoted his studies; and in what manner a student can pass his hours hours in the closest imprisonment. The gate of the prison has sometimes been the porch of same.

Grotius was born with the happiest dispositions: he was studious from his infancy. He received from Nature, says De Burigny, a prosound genius, a solid judgment, and a wonderful memory. He was so fortunate as to find in his father, a pious and able Mentor, who at once formed his genius and his heart. The young Grotius, in imitation of Horace, has celebrated in verse his gratitude for so good a father.

One of the most interesting circumstances in the life of this great man, and which most strongly marks the power of his genius, and the fortitude of his courage, is displayed in the manner in which he employed his time during his imprisonment. It does honour to religion and to science: it eminently proves the consolations which are reserved for the philosopher. When another is condemned to exile and captivity, if he lives, he despairs: the man of letters counts those very days as the sweetest hours of his life.

De Burigny informs us, that when he was a prisoner at the Hague, he laboured on a Latin

Latin essay, on the means of terminating religious disputes, which cause so many infelicities in the State, in the Church, and in families; when he was carried to Louvestein; he resumed his law studies, which other employments had interrupted. He gave a portion of his time to moral philosophy, which engaged him to translate the maxims of the ancient poets, collected by Stobœus, and the fragments of Menander and Phile-Every Sunday was devoted to read the Scriptures, and to write his Commentaries on the New Testament. In the course of this work he fell ill, but as foon as he recovered his health, he composed his Treatise, in Dutch verse, on the Truth of the Christian Religion. Sacred and profane authors occupied him alternately. His only mode of refreshing his mind, was to pass. from one work to another. He sent to Vossius his Observations on the Tragedies of Seneca. He wrote several other works; particularly a little Catechism, in verse, for his daughter Cornelia: and, to conclude, he gathered materials to form his Apology. Add to these various labours, an extensive correspondence he held with the learned, and his friends; and, it is observed, his letters were so many treatises. Although his talents produced thus abundantly, his confinement was not more than two years. We may well exclaim here, in rather a trite expression, that his soul was not imprisoned.

Perhaps the most sincere eulogium, and the most grateful to this illustrious scholar, was that which he received at the hour of his death.

When this great man was travelling to Holland, he was suddenly struck by the hand of Death, at the village of Rostock. The parish minister, who was called in his last moments, ignorant who the dying man was, began to go over the trite and ordinary things said on those occasions. Grotius, who saw there was no time to lose in frivolous exhortations, as he found himself almost at the last gasp, turned to him, and told him, that he needed not those exhortations; and he concluded by saying, Sum Grotius?—

I am Grotius. Tu magnus ille Grotius?—

on the Adjective . PRETTY.

A Young man, lays a critic, told me, he other day, that the Verses of Mr. Gray, were " pretty." They are more than 'pretty," I answered him: you are like him, who having, for the first time in his life, cen the Sea, should exclaim—it was a pretty hing! It was thus also a puny officer, in alking of the Duke of Marlborough, said, fter the battle of Ramillies, he was a pretty nan. The father of the young officer, who vas present, turned to him, with an austeity in his countenance he was little accuromed to wear-" And you are a pretty ool, thus to characterize the greatest man a England." The sterling weight of words not always known to our juvenile critics.

ASTROLOGY.

A BELIEF in Judicial Astrology I conceive ow to exist only in the lower classes of the Vol. I. R people, people, who may be said to have no belief at all; for the sentiments of those who are incapable of reflection, can hardly be said to amount to a belief. But a faith in this, ridiculous system, in our country, is of very late existence.

When Charles the First was confined, Lilly, the astrologer, was consulted for what hour would be most favourable to effect his escape.

A story, which strongly proves how greatly Charles the Second was bigotted to. Judicial Astrology, and whose mind was certainly not unenlightened, is recorded in Burnet's History of his Own Times.

Dryden cast the nativities of his sons; and, what is remarkable, his prediction relating to his son Charles took place. This incident is of so late a date, one might hope it would have been cleared up: but, if it is a fact, we must allow it affords a rational exultation to it's irrational adepts.

It has been known, or at least confidently reported of several, samous for their astrologic skill, that they have suffered a voluntary death, merely to verify their own predictions. This is related of Cardan, and Burton, Burton, the author of the Anatomy of Melancholy. It may appear an improbable circumstance: but who can draw the limit round the extravagance of a false zeal in any cause whatever?

It is curious to observe the shifts to which astrologers are put, when their predictions are not verified. It was thus great winds were predicted, by a samous adept, about the year 1586. No unusual storms, however, happened. Bodin, to save the reputation of the Art, applied it, as a sigure, to some revolutions in the State; and of which there were instances enough at that momient.

The most singular astrological book, perhaps, is the Life of Lilly, the astrologer, written by himself. It was reprinted, being scarce, by Thomas Davies, 1774. I shall just observe of this egregious astronomer, that there is in this work, so much artless narrative, and at the same time so much palpable imposture, that it is difficult to know when he is speaking what he really believes to be the truth. It is well worthy our observation, that in a sketch of the state of astrology in his day, those adepts whose characters he has drawn, were the lowest miscreants of the town. Most of them had taken the air in the pillory, and others had conjured themselves up to the gallows. This seems a true statement of facts. But the same author informs us, that in his various conferences with angels, their voice resembled that of the Irish!

The work is curious for the anecdotes of the times it contains. The amours of Lilly with his mistress are characteristic. He was a very artful man, by his own accounts; and admirably managed matters which required deception and invention.

Astrology slourished in the time of the Civil Wars. The royalists and the rebels had their astrologers, as well as their soldiers; and I have no doubt the predictions of the former had a great influence over the latter.

Mr. Taylor, the Platonist, who is a friend to astrologers, has favoured me with the following version, translated from a fragment of an ancient Greek poet, preserved by Gronovius, in his edition of the Apotelesmatica of Manethon. Mr. Taylor observes, that it is singular that Gronovius should not have known that this fragment is to be found in the printed Eclogues of Stobæus.

The writer gives an account of the influence of the planets on man.

Thro' heaven's bright path, with energy divine,
Seven widely-wandering stars, eternal shine;
The pleasant Sun; the Moon, fair lamp of night,
And Saturn sad, whom tears and woes delight.
Venus, whose arts connubial love inspire,
And boisterous Mars, the friend of discord dire,
The powerful Hermes, decked with graceful wings,
And genial Jove, from whom great Nature springs.
From these, revolving through the azure round,
A mighty Influence on our race is found.
Hence Saturn, Hermes, Jove in Man, are seen,
The Sun, Moon, Mars, and Venus, Beauty's Queen.

For by the Fate's inviolable law,

From an ætherial spirit, these we draw.

Thus Sleep, Tears, Laughter, Birth, Rage, Speech, Desire,

These wandering Stars in human souls inspire.

For Tears are Saturn, much afflicted power!

Our Birth is Jove, who guards the natal hour.

Our Sleep's the Moon, our Rage the God of Arms;

Our

Our Speech is Hermes, and with Laughter gay Accords the nature of the God of Day; Since thro' the splendour of the solar light Our reasoning powers are ravish'd with delight.

ALCHYMY.

It was but the other day I read an advertisement in a newspaper, from one who pretends to have made great discoveries in the Hermetic Art. With the assistance of 'a little money', he could 'positively' assure the lover of this science, that he would repay him 'a thousand-fold!' This science, if it merits to be distinguished by the name, is most certainly an imposition; which, striking on the feeblest part of the human mind, has so frequently been successful in carrying on it's delusions.

As late as the days of Mrs. Manly, the authoress of the Atalantis, is there on record a most singular delusion of Alchymy. The recollection whether it was herself, or another person, on whom it was practised has has now escaped me. From the circumstances, it is very probable the sage was not less deceived than his patroness.

It appears, that an infatuated lover of this delusive art met with one who pretended to have the power of transmuting lead to gold. This hermetic philosopher required only the materials, and time, to perform his golden operations. He was taken to the country residence of his patroness: a long laboratory was built; and, that his labours might not be impeded by any disturbance, no one was permitted to enter into it. His door was contrived to turn round on a spring; so that, unseen, and unseeing, his meals were conveyed to him, without distracting the sublime contemplations of the sage.

During a residence of two years, he never condescended to speak but two or three times in the year to his infatuated patroness. When she was admitted into the laboratory, she saw, with pleasing astonishment, stills, immense caudrons, long slues, and three or four Vulcanian fires blazing at different corners of this magical mine; nor did she behold with less reverence the venerable figure of the dusty philosopher. Pale and emaciated, with daily operations and nightly vigils, he revealed to her, in unintelligible jargon, his progresses: and, having sometimes condescended to explain the mysteries of the arcana, she beheld, or seemed to behold, streams of fluid, and heaps of solid ore, scattered around the laboratory. Sometimes he required a new still, and sometimes vast quantities of lead. Already this unfortunate lady had expended the half of her fortune, in supplying the demands of the philosopher. She began now to lower her imagination to the standard of reason. Two years had now elapsed, vast quantities of lead had gone in, and nothing but lead had come out. She disclosed her sentiments to the philosopher. He candidly confessed he was himself surprized at his tardy processes; but that now he would exert himself to the utmost, and that he would venture to perform a laborious operation, which hitherto he had hoped not to have been necessitated to employ. His patroness retired, and the golden visions of Expectation resumed all their lustre.

One day, as they fat at dinner, a terrible shrick, thrick, and one crack followed by another, loud as the report of cannon, assailed their ears. They hastened to the laboratory: two of the greatest stills had burit; one part of the laboratory was in slames, and the deluded philosopher scorched to death!

An author, who wrote in the year 1704, presents us with the following anecdote, concerning an Alchymical speculation.

'The late Duke of Buckingham, being over-persuaded by a pack of knaves, who called themselves Chemical Operators, that they had the secret of producing the Philosopher's Stone, but wanted money to carry on the process; his Grace engaged to affist them with money to carry on the work. and performed his promise at a vast expence. A laboratory was built, utenfils provided, and the family filled with the most famous artists in the transmutation of metalsadepts of a superior class, who would concern themselves only about the grand elixir, and a pack of shabby curs, to attend the fires, and do other servile offices; and yet, forsooth, must be also called philosophers.

This great charge continued upon the duke for some years; for, whoever was unpaid, paid, or whatever was neglected, money must be sound to bear the charge of the laboratory, and pay the operators; till this chimera, with other extravagancies, had caused the mortgaging and selling many sine manors, lordships, towns, and good farms.

'All this time, nothing was produced by these sons of art of any value; for, either the glass broke, or the man was drunk and let out the fire, or some other missortune, still attended the grand process, at the time assigned for a je ne sçai quoi to be produced, that must turn all things to gold. The duke encountering nothing but disappointments, and the operators finding themselves slighted, and money very difficult to be had, the project sell!'

Periotus, who died at ninety-eight years of age, in the hospital of Sierdon, in Switzerland, had spent nearly his whole life in researches after the Philosopher's Stone; and being, at length, from affluent circumstances reduced to beggary and reason, was accustomed to say—'That if he had a mortal enemy, that he durst not encounter openly, he would advise him, above all things, to give give himself up to the study and practice of 'Alchymy.'

Every philosophical mind must be convinced that Alchymy is not an art, which some have fancifully traced to the remotest times; it may be rather regarded, when opposed to such a distance of time, as a modern imposture. Cæsar commanded the treatises of Alchymy to be burnt throughout the Roman dominions; and this shews the opinion of one who is not less to be admired as a philosopher than as a monarch.

Mr. Gibbon has this succinct passage relative to Alchymy—' The ancient books of Alchymy, so liberally ascribed to Pythagoras, to Solomon, or to Hermes, were the pious frauds of more recent adepts. The Greeks were inattentive either to the use or the abuse of Chymistry. In that immense Register, where Pliny has deposited the discoveries, the arts, and the errors, of mankind, there is not the least mention of the transmutations of metals; and the persecution of Dioclesian is the first authentic event in the history of Alchymy. The conquest of Egypt, by the Arabs, diffused that vain science over the globe. Congenial to the avarice.

avarice of the human heart, it was studied in China, as in Europe, with equal eager-ness and equal success. The darkness of the middle ages ensured a favourable reception to every tale of wonder; and the revival of learning gave new vigour to hope, and suggested more specious arts to deception. Philosophy, with the aid of experience, has at length banished the study of Alchymy; and the present age, however desirous of riches, is content to seek them by the humbler means of commerce and industry.'

'in pursuance of the Philosopher's Stone, which so many do touch, sew catch, and none keep, met a very sad disaster: once when he was on the point of compleating the grand operation, his work unhappily sell into the fire!' This is a missortune which, I observe, has happened to every Alchymist.

Elias Ashmole writes in his diary—' May 13, 1653. My sather Backhouse' san astrologer, who had adopted him for his son—a common practice with these men] 'lying sick in Fleet Street, over-against Saint Dunstan's church, and not knowing whether he should should live or die, about eleven of the clock, told me, in fyllables, the true matter of the Philosopher's Stone, which he bequeathed to me as a legacy.' By this we learn that a miserable wretch knew the art of making gold, yet always lived a beggar. It is certain also,'Ashmole, with all his alchymical knowledge, (and he wrote some bulky tomes on chemistry) never could make a guinea, but what he made by his Law practice.

The following additional information is curious, and very little known. Henry VI. was so reduced by his extravagancies, that, as Mr. Evelyn observes, in his Numismata, he endeavoured to recruit his empty coffers by Alchymy. The Record of this singular proposition, contains 'the most folemn and serious account of the feasibility and virtues of the Philosopher's Stone, encouraging the search after it, and dispensing with all statutes and prohibitions to the contrary'. This record was very probably communicated (says an ingenious antiquary) by Mr. Selden, to his beloved friend Ben Jonson, when he was writing his comedy of the Alchymist.

After this patent was published, many promised to answer the king's expectations so effectually (the same writer adds) that the next year, he published another patent; wherein he tells his subjects, that the bappy bour was drawing nigh, and by means of THE STONE, which he should soon be master of, he would pay all the debts of the Nation, in real gold and silver. The persons picked out for his new operators were as remarkable as the patent itself, viz.

Thomas Hervey, an Austin Friar; Robert Glaselay, a preaching Friar; William Atclysse, the Queen's Physician; Henry Sharp, master of St. Laurence Pontigny College, in London; Thomas Cook, Alderman of London; John Fyld, Fishmonger; John Yonghe, Grocer; Robert Gayton, Grocer; John Sturgeon and John Lambert, Mercers of London.

This patent was likewise granted Authoritate Parliamenti.

Prynne, who has given this patent in his Aurum Reginæ, p. 135, concludes with this farcastic observation—' A project never so seasonable, and necessary as now!'.

This remark will be echoed by certain politicians politicians of the present hour. But the singular national delusion here noticed will certainly never be exhibited again in England.

Alchymists were formerly called Multipliers; as appears from a statute of Henry IV. repealed in the preceding record. The statute being extremely short, I give it for the reader's satisfaction.

'None from henceforth shall use to multiply gold or silver, or use the crast of multiplication; and if any the same do, he shall incur the pain of Felony.'

SAMUEL PURCHAS.

has been made in a former article, has composed what he calls—' A Relation of the World, and the Religions observed in all Ages, and Places discovered from the Creation Unito this Present.' The title page is very Curious, and very long; but, through a mutilation in my copy, I cannot gratify the reader with the whole. The work is written according to the taste of our Royal Peadant: the graces of diction consist in a play upon words—

COWLEY.

The author, on the most serious subjects, indulges his facetious humour: he finds amplification in metaphysical quibbles, and irressible arguments in puns. It will be necessary to give some instances: and it may not be unpleasing to extract a few sentences, which must have greatly delighted our First James—

Being, I know not by what natural inclination, addicted to the studie of Historie, I resolved to turn the pleasures of my studies into studious paines, that others might again, by delightfull studie, turn my paines into their pleasures.'—'I here bring Religion from Paradise to the Ark, and thence sollow her round the world.'

The following Apology of the author is curious and ingenious. It should be recollected, that one part of it's merit consists in it's being prefixed to a Treatise on Geography—

If any mislike the fulnesse in some places, and the barrennesse of words in others, let them consider, we handle a world where are mountains and vallies, fertile habitations, and sandy deserts; and others steps, whom I follow, hold me sometimes in a narrower way, which elsewhere take more libertie.

In addressing the Clergy, Purchas thus plays off an argument in a pun, which may raise a smile—

'I subscribe, with hand and practice, to your Liturgie, but not to your Letargie.'

The fourth edition of this System of Geography—a stupendous labour for those times, and which, with Hackluyt's Voyages, gave birth to the numerous ones we now posses—is dedicated to King Charles the First. From this dedication the present extracts may amuse—

Your Majesties goodnesse hath inuited this boldnes, in accepting my late voluminous twinnes of pilgrimes,'—he means, his former two volumes. Your pietie demands hereditarie respect. Your royall father, the King of Learned, and Learning's king, manifested so much savour to this work, as to make it ordinarie of his bedictarie.

chamber. He professed freely, that he had read it seven times; and that he had made the pilgrimes his nightly taske, till God called him by fatall sicknesse to a better pilgrimage, and of a more enduring kingdome. Such a testimonie is a king of testimonies. Although these times seem more to savour of armes than to savour arts, (inter arma silent Musa) yet our Muse is not of the softer sock, but more masculine, an armed Pallas; not bred in poeticall misterie, but born a real historie, containing actions, factions, and fractions, of religions and states.

He concludes with this curious wish—
Britein's Great Charles! Amen.'

A VISIONARY'S BOOK.

I GIVE the singular title of a work, which is looked upon as the most extravagant production that has ever been published.

It has given birth to a great number of differtations concerning it's subject, it's meaning, and it's author. The last alone seems to have been discovered, who confesses he neither knew how to write or read, but acknowledges himself to have been guided by the inspirations of God and the Angels.

Les Oeuvres de Bernard de Bluet d'Arberes, Comte de Permission, Chevalier des Ligues des XIII Cantons Suisses; et le dit Comte de Permission vous avertit qu'il ne sçait ny lire ny écrire, et ny'a a jamais apris; mais par l'inspiration de Dieu et conduite des Anges et pour la bonté et misericorde de Dieu; et le tout sera dedié à hault et puissant Henry de Bourbon, Roi de France, grand Empereur Théodore premier fils de l'Eglise, Monarque des Gaules, le premier du Monde, par la grace, bonté, et miséricorde de Dieu, le premier jour de Mai l'an 1600.'

Among the great number of writers who have attempted to discover the sense of the Enigmas, and the soolish and extravagant Visions with which this work is loaded, there have been some who imagined that they perceived many remarkable events, S 2 which which were predicted in this book. Others have led their imagination to behold it in another point of view; and there have been even chymists, who have pretended to say, that the great secret of the Philosophical Stone was there concealed under mysterious phrases.

If it is difficult'—fays De Bure—' to give a just idea of this extravagant work, it it, however, more easy, to inform the reader of it's rarity. It has been long known amongst the literary connoisseurs; and it is certain, that nothing is more difficult than to find a compleat copy. Some curious collectors have endeavoured, by sacrificing a great number of copies, to join it's separate parts; but they have always found their endeavours frustrated. This mysterious work seems to have a mysterious conclusion.

This rare volume confists—according to the most compleat copy extant—of one hundred and three fugitive and separate pieces, which the author caused, himself, to have printed, and which he distributed, himself, in streets, and houses, to those persons who made him some pecuniary presents, as he himself informs us, by the acknowledgments which he makes in some of his pieces; where he puts not only the name and the quality of those to whom he presented them, but also the sums which he received from each individual.'

The Abbé Ladyocat has given the following succinct account of this man-'He knew the art of gaining his livelihood, by distributing his extravagancies to whoever he found was willing to purchase them. They contain orations, sentences, but more frequently prophecies. Many have ill-spent their time in explaining the mysteries of his work; and, as is usual in these cases, every one found what he fought: but the truth is, they are visions which came from a head less ridiculous than those of the persons who received them with respect, and recompensed them with their money, unless they were guided to act thus by the benevolence of Charity.'

After what has been laid before the reader, will it be believed, that a compleat collection of the Comte de Permission's absurdities would fetch a very high price among a certain class of Literati? It happens, however, ever, that his leaves, which resemble in their design those of the Roman Sybils, are as difficult to be found. There are men who display a rich fund of Erudition, only by studying Catalogues; and feel themselves as much enchanted by the rarity of an execrable book, as some by the rarity of sine writing!

SCRIPTURE EXPRESSIONS DERIVED FROM CUSTOMS.

It was an ancient ceremony of the Jews, which yet is religiously observed amongst them, to tear their cloaths in mourning and affliction. Some Orientals still practise this custom, when any thing uncommonly distressful happens. The Jews make use of much ceremony on this occasion—Sometimes, they tear from the top to the bottom; and sometimes, from the bottom to the top. The rent must be of a particular length. When it is done for the loss of parents, it is never sewed; for the loss of other persons, it is sewed at the end of thirty days. This piece piece of religious mummery, if it is of no other value, will at least serve to explain a passage, in which Solomon, in his Proverbs, says, that—' There is a time to rend, and a time to sew.' Which means, there is a time for affliction, and a time for consolation. Many of the Scripture phrases, that appear unintelligible, are sounded on Jewish customs.

Mr. Bruce, in his Travels, observed in a cavalcade, the head-dress of the governors of provinces. A large broad fillet was bound upon their forehead, and tied behind their head. In the middle of this was a HORN, or a conical piece of silver, gilt, much in the shape of our candle extinguishers. This is called Kirn, or Horn, and is only worn in reviews, or public rejoicings for victory. This custom, borrowed from the Hebrews, our Traveller conceives, will explain the several allusions made to it in Scripture. 'I said unto fools, deal not. foolishly; and to the wicked, lift not up the HORN—Lift not up your HORN on high; speak not with a stiff neck—But my HORN shalt thou exalt like the horn of an unicorn -And the HORN of the righteous shall be exalted S 4 exalted with honour.' And thus in many other places throughout the Pfalms.

In the 19th Psalm, verse 4. these words:
In them hath he set a Tabernacle for the sun, which is as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber'—Dr. Jackson has illustrated by;—the Psalmist alluding to the Jewish custom of the bridegroom being conducted from his chamber at midnight with great pomp, and preceded by a great number of torches.

NOAH AND SATURN.

THERE can be no doubt that Noah was the Pagan Saturn. Noah was a just man in his days: he endeavoured to enlighten the wicked race amongst whom he lived by his counsels, and to instruct them by his example. Thus, according to Aurelius Victor, and Diodorus, Saturn softened the wicked inclinations of men, and endeavoured to bring them back to their ancient purity of manners, by a civilized and regulated life.

Between

Between the Deluge and the birth of Phales leg there was an interval of one hundred years; when, the world not being yet shared out, Noah had a natural right to be the Sovereign of his children. This is the Golden Age the Poets so much celebrate, where every thing was in common.

Moses calls Noah, Isch-badama—that is, the Man of the Earth—for Labourer.

The Mythologists, who accommodated their fables to history, observing that the Hebrew word bore two significations, either Man or Husband, say, that Rhea, or the Earth, was the wife of Saturn; and, as the Man of the Earth also relates to Agriculture, they attribute to Saturn the art of cultivating sields, vines, and meadows, representing him with a scythe in his hands.

From the passage in Genesis, where it is said, Noah was intoxicated with the liquor of the vines he had planted, they have said also that Saturn presided over Ebriety. Hence they called that day in the year in which the masters attended their slaves, The Saturnalian Feast.

Plato says, in his Timæus, that Saturn, Rhea, and their family, were born of the Ocean Ocean and Thetis; which corresponds with Noah and his family coming from the waters of the Deluge.

Saturn had, for successors, his three children, Jupiter, Neptune, and Pluto; and Noah shared out the earth to his three sons, Shem, Ham, and Japheth. This last, who is Neptune, had for his portion, all the isles and peninsulas of the sea.

Moses says, that God consecrated to himself a church in the family of Shem; and; as he must have been the greatest enemy of the Idolaters, it is very probable that, hating him, they made him Pluto, who is the god of Hell and the Dead.

Cham, or Ham, had for his portion Africa. Arabia, and Egypt; which, after his name, was anciently called Chemie, where he was adored, during many ages, under the name of Jupiter Ham, Hammon, &c. And why the Pagans said of Jupiter, that he cut those parts of his father Saturn which it is not allowed to name, comes from this passage of the ninth chapter of Genesis being misunderstood—Quod cum videret Cham pater Canaan, verenda patris sui esse nudata, nunnavit. This last word is, in the Hebrew, brew, vajagged; and, perhaps, the vowel points not being marked, occasioned them to read vejagod, which signifies cut.

METEMPSICHOSIS.

Is we feek for the origin of the opinion of the Metempsichosis, or the Transmigration of Souls into other bodies, we must plunge linto the remotest antiquity; and even then we shall find it impossible to fix the epoch of it's first author. We know that the notion was long extant in Greece before the time of Pythagoras. Herodotus assures us that the Egyptian priests taught it; but he does not inform us about the time it began to be fpread. It is very probable it followed the opinion of the Immortality of the Soul. As foon as the first phi-Iosophers had established this dogma, they thought they could not maintain this immortality without a transmigration of souls.

The opinion of the Metempsichosis spread in almost every region of the earth; and it continues, even to the present time, in all it's force amongst those nations who have not yet embraced Christianity. The people of Arracan, Pegu, Siam, Camboya, Tonquin, Cochin-china, Japan, Java, and Ceylon, are still in that error, which also forms the chief article of the Chinese religion.

TRANSLATION.

THE following observations on Translation are offered to our modern doers into English. To whom I am indebted, for this article has escaped my recollection.

To render a Translation perfect, it is necessary to attend to these rules.—The translator must possess a thorough knowledge of the two languages. He must be exact, not only in giving the thoughts of his author, but even his own words, when they become essential and necessary. He must preserve the spirit and peculiar genius of his author. He must distinguish every character by it's manners manners and it's nature, by unfolding the fense and the words with suitable phrases and parallel expressions. He must yield beauties by other beauties, and figures by other figures, whenever the idiom of language does not admit of a close version. He must not employ long sentences, unless they serve to render the sense more intelligible, and the diction more elegant. He must attempt a neatness in his manner; and, to effect this, he must know skilfully to contract or enlarge his periods. He must unite the too concile fentences of his author, if his style, like that of Tacitus, be close and abrupt. He must not only sedulously attempt precision and purity of diction, but he must strive also to embellish his version with those graces and images which frequently lie so closely hidden, that nothing. but the being familiarly conversant with hisauthor can discover them. And, laftly, he must present us with the sentiments of his author, without a fervile attachment to his words or phrases, but rather, according to his spirit and his genius.

A translator is a painter who labours after an original. He must carefully reveal the traits traits of his model. He copies, he does not compose. Whenever he trespasses on his limits, he ceases to be a translator, and becomes an author.

THE ORIGIN OF NEWSPAPERS AND PE

THE Newspapers of the present day, contrasted with their original models, have attained a degree of excellence which is flattering to modern industry to contemplate. While political events are registered with a celerity unknown to our ancestors, the sentiments of liberty are disseminated in the warm impression of the moment. The frivolous pursuits of the age offer an ample field to those who can point with force the keenness of Ridicule. Fashion, however versatile, cannot escape the eye of the satirist; and the follies of the night are chronicled for the fober contemplation of the morning. Literature has been called in to embellish these diurnal pages; and it has given a stability and perfection, of which the evanesecnt thought susceptible. It is, however, a melancholy truth, that such excellent purposes have been frustrated by a vile spirit of saction; a spirit that, according to the sensible Rapin, will sooner overturn the English Constitution than the united efforts of our most powerful enemies. But such discussions we leave to the sagacious politicians.

We are obliged to the Italians for the idea of Newspapers. It was their Gazettasperhaps derived from Gazzera, a magpie or chatterer-which have given a name to these publications. Menage, indeed, in his Origini della lingua Italiana, is of opinion with others, that it comes from a little coin. peculiar to the City of Venice, called Gazzetta, which was the common price of the Besides these etymons, we are newspapers. obliged to the learned English Reviewer, in his account of Lodge's State Papers for June 1792, for another, not unworthy of that historical acumen, for which the writer, if I am not mistaken, has long and deservedly been celebrated. Mr. Lodge has given the common etymology, but which our ingenious critic thus opposes. He tells us, that this this etymon has always appeared to him improbable. These are his words—'It is improbable, that when there was only thir newspaper published at Venice; and when, therefore, there could be no occasion for discriminating this from others, that this should be denominated (as it were : the Far-. thing Paper. It is more improbable that, in these or in any circumstances, this or any paper should be called, not the Farthing Paper, but the Farthing only. It is still. more improbable that, as the paper must have had a name before it gained a sale, the former should be superseded by the latter, and the coin given for it should cover the original name with it's own. These improbabilities, united together, form a kind of constructive impossibility, we think, againstthe common etymology of the word Gazette; while there is another, which must: occur to every mind, and has been long familiar to our own. In that language, which we know to have been the Italian of past ages, the Latin, Gaza would colloquially lengthen in the diminutive into Gazetta; and, as applied to a newspaper, would fignify a little treasury of news. This etymon is as natural and just, as the other is strange and forced. And in that language, which carries equal Latinity with the Italian in it's constitution, the Spanish, we find Gazeta still signifying "Enarratio Nunciorum;" and we see some of the Spanish dictionaries actually deriving it from the Latin Gaza, and deriving equally their Gazatero and our Gazatteer, for a writer of the Gazette, and what is peculiar to themselves. Gazetista for a lover of the Gazette, from the same source:

Newspapers then took their birth in that principal land of modern politicians, Italy, and under the government of that aristocratical republic, Venice. The first newspaper was a Venetian one, and only monthly: but it was the newspaper of the government only. Other governments afterwards adopted the Venetian plan of a newspaper, with the Venetian name for it; and, from one solitary government Gazette, we see what an inundation of newspapers has burst out upon us in this country,

Those who first wrote newspapers, were called, by the Italians, Menanti; because, Vol. I.

Those who first wrote newspapers, were called, by the Italians, Menanti; because, says.

fays Vossius, they intended commonly, by these loose papers, to spread about defamatory reflections, and were therefore prohibited in Italy by Gregory XIII. by a particular bull, under the name of Menantes, from the Latin Minantes—threatening. Menage, however, derives it from the Italian Menare, which signifies—to lead at large, or spread afar.

Periodical papers seem first to have been used by the English, during the civil wars of the usurper Cromwell, to disseminate amongst the people the sentiments of loyalty or rebellion, according as their authors were disposed. Honest Peter Heylin, in the preface to his Cosmography, mentions, that the affairs of each town, or war, were better presented to the reader in the Weekly News-books.' In their origin they were solely devoted to political purposes: but they soon became a public nuisance, by serving as receptacles of party malice, and echoing to the farthest ends of the kingdom the insolent voice of Faction. They set the minds of men more at variance, enflamed their tempers to a greater fierceness, and gave a keener edge to the sharpness of civil discord.

It is to be lamented, that such works will always find writers adapted to their scurrilous purposes; but of a vast crowd that is sued from the press, though little more than a century has elapsed, they are now not to be found but in a few private collections. They form a race of authors unknown to most readers of these times: the name of their chief, however, has just reached us, but is on the point of disappearing.

Sir Roger L'Estrange, who appears to have greatly surpassed his rivals, and to have been esteemed as the most perfect model of political writing, merits little praise. The temper of the man was factious and brutal, and the compositions of the author very indifferent. In his multifarious productions, and meagre translations, we discover nothing that indicates one amiable sentiment, to compensate for a barbarous diction, and a heavy load of political trash. His attempts at wit are clumfy exertions; the aukward efforts of a German who labours on a delicate toy. When he assumes the gravity of the sage, he seems more fortunate in extorting a laugh; burlesquing the most solemn T 2 refleçreflections by quaint and uncouth expression.

In the reign of Queen Anne—not unjustly characterized by being distinguished as the Augustan Age of English Literature— Periodical Prints, that till then had only served political purposes, began to rank higher in the estimation of the public. Some had already attempted to introduce literary subjects, and other topics of a more general speculation. But we see nothing that has escaped the waste of time, till Sir Richard Steele formed the plan of his Tatler. He defigned it to embrace the three provinces, of Manners, of Letters, and of Politics. He knew that this was an invaluable. improvement; and, doubtless, he thought, that if the last portion could be omitted, it would still have made it more perfect, violent and sudden reformation is seldom to be used; and the public were to be conducted insensibly into so new and different a track from that to which they had been hitherto accustomed. Hence politics were admitted into his paper. But it remained for the chaster genius of Addison to banish this this disagreeable topic from his elegant pages. The writer in Polite Letters selt himself degraded, by sinking into the dull narrator of political events. It is from this time that Newspapers and periodical Literature became distinct works.

PHYSIOGNOMY AND PALMISTRY.

EVERY one seems not a little to have studied Lavater; so that—if the expression does not offend—most men are ashamed to shew their faces. Perhaps it is not generally known that an ancient Greek author has written on Physiognomy. This work is translated into Latin by the Count Charles de Montecuculli, enriched with very learned annotations.

One Walfon assured George Wheeler, who published his Travels into Dalmatia, Greece, and the Levant—a very curious work—that he had purchased a chest-sull of very scarce Arabic books; amongst which was a Treatise on Chiromancy, more curious than that of John Baptiste Porta; in T 3 which which the author shews, that the lines in the hand are letters, of which he presents the reader with an alphabet.

The following curious physiological definition of Physiognomy is extracted from a publication by Dr. Gwither, of the year 1604—

- And numerous impressions than are imprinted on a man's face by objects moving his affections: and not only the objects themselves have this power, but also the very images or ideas; that is to say, any thing that puts the animal spirits into the same motion that the object present did, will have the same effect with the object. To prove the sirst, let one observe a man's face looking on a pitiful object, then a ridiculous, then a strange, then on a terrible or dangerous object, and so forth. For the second, that ideas have the same effect with the object, dreams consirm too often.
- The manner I conceive to be thus—The animal spirits, moved in the sensory by an object, continue their motion to the brain, whence the motion is propagated to this of that particular part of the body, as is most suitable suitable to the design of it's creation; having first made an alteration in the face by it's nerves, especially by the pathetic and oculorum motorii actuating it's many muscles, as the dial-plate to that stupendous piece of clock-work, which shews what is to be expected next from the striking part. Not that I think the motion of the spirits in the sensory continued by the impression of the object all the way, as from a finger to the foot: I know it too weak, though the tenseness of the nerves favours it. But I conceive it done in the medulla of the brain, where is the common stock of spirits; as in an organ, whose pipes being uncovered, the air rushes into them; but the keys, let go, are stopped again. Now, if by repeated acts, or frequent entertaining of the ideas of a favourite idea of a passion or vice, which natural temperament has hurried one to, or custom dragged, the face is so often put into that posture which attends such acts, that the animal spirits find such latent passages into it's nerves, that it is sometimes unalterably set: as the Indian Religious are, by long continuing in strange postures in their Pagods. But, most commonly, such a habit a habit is contracted, that it falls insensibly into that posture, when some present object does not obliterate that more natural impression by a new, or dissimulation hide it.

· Hence it is that we see great drinkers, with eyes generally set towards the nose, the adducent muscles being often employed to let them see their loved liquor in the glass at the time of drinking; which were, therefore, called bibitory. Lascivious persons are remarkable for the Oculorum Mobilis Petulanta, as Petronius calls it. From this also. we may solve the Quaker's expecting face, waiting the pretended Spirit; and the melancholy face of the Sectaries; the studious face of men of great application of mind; revengeful and bloody men, like executioners in the act: and though silence, in a sort, may awhile pass for wisdom, yet, sooner or later, Saint Martin peeps through the disguise, to undo all. A changeable face I have observed to shew a changeable mind. But I would by no means have what has been said understood as without exception: for I doubt not but sometimes there are found men with great and virtuous souls under very unpromising outsides,"

CHARACTERS DESCRIBED BY MUSICAL NOTES.

THE present communication is made by an ingenious young friend. It is an extract from a volume of 'Philosophical Transactions and Collections,' published at the end of the year 1700. 'The curious conjectures it contains, being perfectly novel to me,'— my friend observes—' may, perhaps, be so to you and many others.'

The idea of describing characters under the names of Musical Instruments, has been already displayed. The two most pleasing papers which embellish the Tatler, are written by Addison. He there dwells on this idea with uncommon success. It has been applauded for it's originality; and, in the general presace to that work, those Papers are distinguished for their selicity of imagination. Let it, however, be recollected, that the following Paper was published in the year 1700, and the two Numbers of Addison in the year 1710. It is probable that this this inimitable writer borrowed his ideas from this work.

- 'A conjecture at dispositions from the modulations of the voice.'
- been, but a little before, musical, I chanced to take notice, that, in ordinary discourse, words were spoken in perfect notes; and that some of the company used eighths, some spiths, some thirds; and that his discourse which was most pleasing, his words, as to their tone, consisted most of concords, and were of discords of such as made up harmony. The same person was the most affable, pleasant, and best-natured in the company. This suggests a reason why many discourses, which one bears with much pleasure, when they come to be read, scarce seem the same things.
  - From this difference of Music in Speech; we may conjecture that of Tempers. We know the Doric mood founds gravity and fobriety; the Lydian, buxomness and freedom; the Æolic, sweet stillness and quiet composure; the Phrygian, jollity and youthful levity; the Ionic is a stiller of storms and disturbances arising from passion. And why why may not we reasonably suppose, that those whose speech naturally runs into the notes peculiar to any of these moods, are likewise, in nature, hereun congenerous? C Fa ut, may shew me to be of an ordinary capacity, though good disposition. G Sol re ut, to be peevish and esseminate. Flats, a manly or melancholic sadness. He who hath a voice which will, in some measure, agree with all cliffs, to be of good parts, and fit for variety of employments, yet somewhat of an inconstant nature. Likewise from the TIMES: so semi-briefs, may speak a temper dull and phlegmatic; minums, grave and serious; crotchets, a prompt wit; quavers, vehemency of pession, and scolds use them. Semi-brief-rest, may denote one either stupid, or fuller of thoughts than he can utter; minum-rest, one that deliberates; crotchet-rest, one in a passion. So that, from the natural use of Mood, Note, and TIME, we may collect DISPOSITIONS.

LITERARY COMPOSITION.

In a little Tract, printed in 1681, is to be found some curious literary information. The ingenious author attempts to mark out the most profitable way of reading and writing books. He first informs us of various voluminous writers; of some, so infected with the cacoethes scribendi, that they have composed from six to seven thousand volumes! He then notices vast libraries; such as that of Ptolomy, King of Egypt, which was said to contain four hundred thousand; or, as others write, seven hundred thousand volumes: and also that of the younger Theodosius, at Constantinople, containing ten myriads of books.

He reflects that, since the invention of printing, an author can publish as much in one day as he has composed in one year. He laments, that these multifarious volumes may prove prejudicial to the student; that such a continued novelty of matter will render der his knowledge less olear and digested than before this invention took place: though he is willing to allow that this evil originates rather from the ill use made of books, than from their number.

He complains—a complaint, I fear, which must ever exist—that the press is continually pouring forth trivial, crude, and useless personances: yet he observes—'If men would take care that ill books be not written, and that good books be not ill written, but that in their composition a due regard be always had to prudence, solidity, perspicuity, and brevity, there would be no cause lest for us to complain of the too great number of books.'

By the idea of prudence, he would have us understand, that an author should never rashly or inconsiderately apply himself to composition: let him learn well what he purposes to teach to others. The greatest scholars have always taken time to make their compositions approach perfection. Isocrates spent ten, or, as some will have it, sisteen years in polishing one panegyric. Dion Cassius employed twelve years in writing his History, and ten years in preparing his his Memoirs. Virgil employed seven years to finish his Bucolics; and, after a labour of eleven years, pronounced his Æneid impersect. Jacobus Sannazarius wrote three books de Partu Virginis, and dedicated twenty years to this labour. Diodorus Siculus was thirty years in composing his History. Hence he advises writers to reslect on the reply of Zeuxis to one who boasted of a more sluent hand in painting—Diu pingo, quia eternitati pingo—'I paint but a line every day; but I paint for posterity.'

In works of importance, he would have us be studious of what he calls folidity. He means, that our arguments should be forcibly urged, and skilfully applied; that every thing we write tend to shew that we feel ourselves the conviction of what we would convince our reader; that nothing be feeble, doubtful, or frivolous; that truth be firm, clear, and as indisputable as possible. 'Not,' as he candidly remarks, 'that this folidity can be every where observed alike, it being above the infirmity of man so to do; but men should be very wary not to flatter themselves that others will believe their bare say-so's.'

By perspicuity, he requires that the style serves like a mirror to the mind of the another; so that the sense may be lucidly pressented to the reader. As for those authors who are pleased to throw over their compositions an affected obscurity, he shrewdly remarks, that they might gratify their humans mour and the world much better by remaining silent.

Lastly, he would not have perficulty far indulged as to neglect brevity. For, an obscurity makes a book useless; so, if drawn out in length, it becomes tedious. To obvise the writer not to give into wild digressions, but always to give into wild digressions, but always to keep close to his main subject; to reject as much as possible, trite sentiments; and samiliar arguments; to be sparing of an idle amplification of words; and, in controversy, not so much to combat his adversaries by number as by weight of arguments.

To close this slight review, which, I hope, will not be found unuseful, he exhorts the ingenuous youth not to delight in a multiplicity of authors; to be select in his choice, and then studiously to unite himself to those suthors authors whom he finds most congenial to his own dispositions. An excellent ruld this! And, to conclude with a verse from the Earl of Roscommon—

To chuse an Author as he would a Friend?

For the benefit of young authors, I will add the advice of a veteran on Publica-tion—

Menage observes, that the works which are most generally liked, give a more extensive reputation than the most excellent ones; which are only relished by a sew connoiseurs. The dishes at a feast should rather be seasoned to the taste of the guests than to that of the cooks, however able they may be: for, as Martial says—

Malim Convivis, quam placuisse Cocis.

To give a work which may be crowned with the approbation of the public, it must be read three times: the first, perfectly to understand it; the second, to criticise it; and the third, to correct it.

It is justly blesved by Bayle, that correction is by no means practicable by some authors.

authors. This he illustrates by what he relates of Ovid. When he was in exile, his compositions were only repetitions of what he had before said; and said, too, with more spirit. He confesses both negligence and idleness in the corrections of his works. The defect we notice was not unknown to him; but the vivacity which animated his first productions, failing him when he revised his poems, he found correction too laborious, and he abandoned it. But this is only an excuse. 'It is certain,' observes our acute critic, 'that some authors cannot correct. They compose with pleasure, and with ardour; and it is thus they exhaust all their force: they fly but with one wing when they review their works; the first fire does not return; there is in their imagination a certain calm which hinders their pen from making any progress. Their mind is like a boat, which only advances by the strength of oars.'

We may apply to Literary Composition the saying of an ancient philosopher. He observed, that a little thing gave perfection, although perfection was not a little thing.

Vol. I. U Malherbe,

Malherbe, the father of French poetry, wrote little. He worked with prodigious flowness; and employed himself more in perfecting, than in forming works. His Muse is compared to a fine woman in the pains of delivery. He exulted in this flowness; and was accustomed to say, that, after having finished a poem of one hundred verses, or a discourse of ten pages, he should repose for ten years. Gray entertained the same notion: and it is hard to say if it arose from the sterility of their genius, or the chastity of their judgment.

Of Pope's continual corrections, and critical rasures, the reader has been informed. The celebrated Madame Dacier never could satisfy herself when she translated Homer: she was continually retouching the version, even in it's happiest passages. There were several parts which she translated in six or seven manners; and she frequently noted in the margin—I have not yet done it.

Nicole, in his preface to Paschal's Provincial Letters, informs us, that when Paschal became warm in the controversy, he applied himself with an incredible labour and car to their composition. He was frequently for twenty days occupied on a single letter. He recommenced some above seven and eight times, that he might carry them to the perfection in which they now are. Voltaire says, 'it is one of the best books ever published in France.'

Pellisson says, on the Quintus Curtius of Vaugolas, which occupied him 30 years, that he had seen the sheets, and that generally every period was translated in the margin sive or six several ways, almost all of them very good. Chapelain and Conrart, who took the pains to review this work critically, were many times perplexed in their choice of passages, and what Pellisson considered as remarkable, generally that which had been first composed, was that which they liked best. The shortest Letters of Balzac and Voiture, were the labour of a fortnight.

D'Andilly, the translator of Josephus, asked Richelet, who was intimately acquainted with D'Ablancourt, (another very celebrated translator) how often this ingenious writer retouched his works before he gave them to the public. Six times, answered Richelet. And I, replied D'Andilly, red U 2 wrote ten times my history of Josephus. I chastised the style with care, and could never please myself.

Some authors spare no trouble or expence to improve their works. Cardinal Perron frequently printed his works twice before he ventured to publish them: the first, to distribute them amongst his friends, that they might make their observations; the second, to give them to the public in a more perfect state.

On blotting and correcting, Churchill said —' It was like cutting away one's own flesh.'

VIRGIL.

HAS not Virgil violated the immutable laws of common sense, which exist in sull force in all ages, and in all countries, by his strange miracles, which, Marville says, are not less insupportable than those which the ancient chroniclers relate of their saints? Among these, we may observe, is that of transforming into the Leaves of a Tree, of which Polydore is the Root, the Lances with with which Polymnestor had pierced him in the third book of the Æneid; in making the Branch of a Tree produce a Golden Bough, in the sixth; and in metamorphosing into Sea Nymphs, in the eleventh book, the Ships of Æneas, which were set on sire. A critic has said, that these sictions are not miraculous, but ridiculous, and only serve to blemish so beautiful a composition!

We must also condemn, in Virgil, that cruel Piety by which he has distinguished Æneas, in causing him to immolate eight persons on the funeral-pile of Pallas. The example of Homer, which he has here followed, cannot excuse a barbarity which shocks our feelings. This cruel action was characteristic of the furious Achilles in the circumstance of the death of Patroclus, but should not have been performed by the pious Æneas. Besides, Virgil, who had more judgment than Homer, and who lived in a more polished age, is less excusable in having made his Hero commit so barbarous an action.

In the fourth book of the Æneid, we are compelled to animadvert on another fault, which pains our sensibility. In that book, where the poet expresses so well the madness of a despairing lover, Æneas appears by much too cold; and his excuses are, indeed, not very ingenious for his desertion of Dido —in a word, not a little unfeeling. To all: the reproaches of the passionate and tender queen, he has only to oppose the orders of Jupiter, and the severity of his fate. He cannot doubt of the extreme violence of her passion; and he must necessarily know to what an excess a woman of her fervid spirit, who pretended to be united to him as his wife, would carry it: yet he sleeps, in the most perfect tranquillity, in his vessel, till Mercury awakens him.

U 3 where

Some of his adventures seem copies of each other. Sinon and Acheminedes present themselves to the Trojans on two very different occasions, but in nearly a similar manner. The one in his second book, and the other in the third, say the same things. The descriptions of the tempests too frequently resemble each other; and they begin two or three times by the same verses. This beautiful verse—is too often repeated. There are also contradictions; which, probably, he would have corrected, had he lived.

· Obstupui,

He relates, in the fifth book, the circumstances of the death of Palinurus in one manner; and Palinurus himself, in the fixth, relates it differently. In one, it is the god of Sleep, under the figure of Phorbas, who having caused the pilot to fall asleep, precipitates him and the rudder into the sea; in the other, it is a gale of wind that carries them both away. In one place, Palinurus is swallowed up in a prosound sleep by the sea; in the other, he is perfectly awake, and has time to reslect that the ship will now wander without a pilot.

Virgil should not have caused Æneas to return from Hell by the gate of Ivory, but by that of Horn. By employing here the gate of Ivory, from whence issued fables and sictions, formed at pleasure—Sed falsa ad Cælum mittunt insomnia manes—is it not destroying, at a single stroke, the whole that he has been recounting in that incomparable book; and tacitly informing Augustus, that all he had imagined most flattering for him and his ancestors, is nothing but a mere idle siction?

In the second book of the Æneid, Ascanius appears a little child, led by the hand of his father: he could not have attained to more than seven years. In the third, Andromache, calling to mind Astyanax her son, and addressing herself to Ascanius, says—' Were he living, he would now, like you, have reached the age of puberty—

Et nunc æquali tecum pubesceret avo."

Ascanius was not, then, a child, before he went to Africa? Yet Virgil makes him again but seven years in his fourth book, when Dido holds Cupid in her lap, who had assumed his figure: yet, in the very same book, he is represented, not as a child, but as a young and vigorous man, in a hunting match, of which he gives a description.

These things are very irregular and dissimilar: contradictions which are very material, and which cannot be reconciled. Virgil, on his death-bed, commanded his friends to burn his Æneid. The great poet was conscious of it's unfinished state. Fortunately tunately for posterity, they did not in this respect obey the injunctions of their dying friend. The loss had, indeed, been irreparable.

Let it not be considered, that I have collected these criticisms to diminish the reputation of Virgil. As the Æneid is acknowledged not to have received the finishing hand, it may be rendered useful in exercising the youthful mind, to discern the petty blemishes amongst the great beauties of a great master.

Virgil can be defended from a censure, which attacks at once the poet and the man. Several eminent critics (observes Menage) are much furprized that Virgil, in his fixth book of the Æneid, describing the Laurel Grove which he has affigned for the refidence of the Poets, makes no mention of Homer. On this they have taxed Virgil with ingratitude and envy; fince here an occasion presented itself so favourably to bestow a beautiful eulogium on Homer, to whom he stood so deeply indebted; and they have been aftonished why he preferred to do this honour to the ancient Musaus. But this cenfure is very unjust, and could only only be occasioned by not reslecting sufficiently on the order of time. Let us confider, that Virgil only sollows his hero: if he speaks of Musæus, it is that he had no other design but to mention those poets who died before the taking of Troy. He was too judicious to cause Æneas to relate that he had seen Homer amongst the poets, who was not born till at least one hundred and sixty years after the destruction of Troy.

The fage Huet affords me another observation, which appears just. He says, that faults will escape the attention of the greatest men. Virgil is fallen into a gross error, when he compares Orpheus deploring the loss of his beloved Eurydice with the Nightingale who regrets the loss of her young. He first makes the nightingale sing in the shade of a poplar—Populea mærens, philomela sub umbra; and directly after this song is a nocturnal song—set noctem. How can the night and the shade of the poplar meet together? Besides, the nightingale ceases to sing when it is delivered of its young.

Virgil, in the second book of the Georgics, hast bestowed high culogiums on the fertile territory territory of Nole, in Campania: but, the inhabitants of this city not chusing to allow their waters to run through his lands, he erased Nole, and put Ora in it's place. So dreadful is the vengeance of a poet!

The banquet which Alcinous gives Ulysses, in the Odyssey, is very beautiful, and perfectly gallant: but it appears there are none but men present. That with which Dido entertains Æneas is not by any means comparable to it in festal elegance. In one, they sing the adventures of the gods, and other themes, not less agreeable than gallant: in the other, they sing concerning the stars, and other philosophical matters. Let the festive splendours of Alcinous be removed to the court of Carthage, and the feast of Dido to the Pheacian Island; and every thing will then be in character.

To this article may be added an account of a thirteenth book of the Æneid. A poet, named Maphæus Vegius Laudanensis—so Naudé writes it, but I observe his commentator tells us it should be Laudensis—was born at Lodi, in the year 1407. At sixteen years of age he gave evident marks of an excellent excellent genius. What is remarkable of him, he has, with great felicity, added a thirteenth book to the Æneid.

MILTON.

It is painful to observe the acrimony which the most eminent scholars insuse frequently in their controversial writings. The politeness of the present times has, in some degree, softened the malignity of the man in the dignity of the author; though it must be confessed, there are living writers who pride themselves on being—as they express it—of the Warburtonian school; but who display the asperity rather than the erudition of a Warburton.

The ingenious critic in the Monthly Review has said of this article, that it is not to the honour of Literature to revive such controversies. I confess it is not. The same observation was made when the Abbé Iraild published, in sour volumes, a work entitled Querelles Litteraires. That work excited loud loud murmurs: but surely very unjustly. Must we suppose, that men of letters are exempt from the human passions? The sensibility of men of genius is more irritable, on the contrary, than the callous feelings of common men. And I am of opinion, that to shew how ridiculous truly great men can appear when they act so unworthy of themselves as to employ the abusive style of the illiterate, may be one great means of restraining that serocious pride which still exists in the republic of letters. Johnson, at least, appears to have entertained the same opinion; for he thought proper to republish the low invective of Dryden against Settle: a more deplorable instance of literary irritation I do not recollect.

The celebrated controversy of Salmasus and Milton—the first, the advocate of King Charles; the other, the defender of the people—was of that magnitude, that all Europe took a part in the paper-war of these two great men. The answer of Milton, who perfectly massacred Salmasius, is now read but by the sew. Whatever is addressed to the times, however great may be it's merit, is doomed doomed to perish with the times; yet, on these pages the philosopher will not contemplate in vain.

It will form no uninteresting article to gather a few of the rhetorical weeds—for slowers we cannot well call them—with which they mutually presented each other. Their rancour was at least equal to their erudition, though they were the two most learned scholars of the learned age.

Salmasius was a man of vast erudition, but no taste. His writings are learned, but sometimes ridiculous. He called his work Defensio Regia—Desence of Kings. The opening of this work induces one to laugh. He begins thus—'Englishmen! who toss the heads of kings as so many tennis balls; who play with crowns as if they were bowls; who look upon sceptres as so many crooks, &c.

That the deformity of the body is an idea we attach to the deformity of the mind, the vulgar must acknowledge; but surely it is unpardonable in the enlightened philosopher thus to compare corporeal matter with intellectual spirit: yet Milbourne and Dennis—the last a formidable critic—have frequently quently considered, that comparing Dryden and Pope to whatever the eye turned from with disgust, was very good argument to lower their literary, abilities. Salmasius seems also to have entertained this idea, though his spies in England gave him wrong information; or, possibly, he only drew the figure of his own distempered imagination.

Salmasius sometimes reproaches Milton, as being but a puny piece of Man; a tiwarf deprived of the human figure; a being composed of nothing but skin and bone; a contemptible pedagogue, fit only to flog his boys: and sometimes elevating the ardour of his mind into a poetic frenzy, he applies to him these words of Virgil--- Minstrum borrendum, informe, ingens, cui lumen ademptum.' Our great Poet thought this senseles declamation merited a serious refutation; perhaps he did not wish to appear despicable in the eyes of the ladies. If the great Johnson could express his pleasure, at learning that Milton wore latchets to his shoes, his admirers must be interested in this description of himself. He says, that he does not think any one ever considered him as unbeautiful; that his fize rather approached mediocrity than the diminutive; that he still felt the same courage and the same strength which he possessed when young, when, with his sword, he felt no difficulty to combat with men more robust than himself; that his sace, far from being pale, emaciated, and wrinkled, did him much credit; for though he had passed his fortieth year, he was in all other respects ten years younger. For all this he called for testimony on multitudes; who, though they knew him but by sight, would hold him ridiculous if he did not reveal the truth.

Morus, in his Epistle Dedicatory of his Clamor Regii Sanguinis, compares Milton to a Hangman: his disordered vision to the blindness of his soul; and vomits forth so much rancour and venom, that to collect his calumnies ceases to become an amusive employment.

When Salmasius found that his strictures on the person of Milton were salse, and that, on the contrary, it was uncommonly beautiful, he then turned his battery against those graces with which Nature had so liberally adorned his adversary. And it is now that he seems to have set no restrictions of Milton's success, he throws out the blackest calumnies, and the most infamous asperfions.

It must be observed, when Militon sirst proposed to answer Salmasius, he had lost the use of one of his eyes: and his physicians declared, that if he applied himself to the controversy, the other would likewise close for ever! His patriotism was not to be bassled but with life itself. Unhappily, the prediction of his physicians took place! Thus a learned man, in the occupations of study, falls blind; a circumstance which even now agonizes the heart of Sensibility. Salmasius considers it as one from which he may draw caustic ridicule, and satiric severity.

Salmasius glories that Milton lost his health and his eyes in answering his apology for King Charles! He does not now reproach him with natural deformities; but he malignantly sympathises with him, that he now to more is in possession of that beauty which rendered him so amiable during his residence in Italy. He speaks more plainly in a sollowing page; and, in a word, would Vol. I.

blacken the austere virtue of Milton with a crime too infamous to name.

Impartiality of Criticism obliges us to confess, that Milton was not destitute of rancour. And, when it was told him that his adversary boasted he had occasioned the loss of his eyes, he answered, with the ferocity of the irritated Puritan—'And I shall cost bim bis life!' A prediction which was soon after verified: for Christina, Queen of Sweden, withdrew her patronage from Salmasius, and sided with Milton. The universal neglect the proud Scholar felt, in consequence, hastened his death.

The story of his expulsion from Cambridge was not forgotten—nor forgotten to be aggravated. Milton denies this, and relates it in a manner honourable to himself. Salmasius assures his reader, that those who well knew Milton assirm, that he was incapable of Latin composition; but—in his manner of raillery—he consesses Milton to be an extraordinary Poet; and this he maintains by pointing out how frequently he violates, in his Latin verses, the laws of quantity. He adds, that the Author mighthave spared himself the pains of indicating his his Age; for, without this aid, his reader must have been convinced that they were the compositions of the raw Scholar. To close the virulence of his invectives, he tells us, that Milton's book is written by a French schoolmaster in London, and that he only lent his name.

What Patin writes in his Letters, in the same times, will shew what lame reports the enemies of Milton helped about. He writes — Monsieur de la Mothe le Vayer informs me, that the book of Milton against the king of England has been burnt by the common hangman in Paris: that Milton is in prison; and, it is to be hoped, will be hanged. Some say that Milton wrote this Book in English; and that a Peter de Moulin, who has put it into such fine Latin, is in danger, for his pains, of being burnt.' This is in the usual style of Patin's correspondence; some truth, with much siction. Moulin was a Confessor of the royal party; and was, on the contrary, a favourite with our second Charles; and who, having written against the rebels, was one of the few whose fidelity he rewarded.

It is raking in offals to transcribe from the X 2 infacannot now irritate; it may amuse. He seems to have peached in Salmasius for epithets. His pamphlets, with the common lyes of the day, have met the common fate. The present paragraph is an odd mixture of pedantry, of vile composition, and viler abuse.

Milton, whom the present generation of writers, if they do not on some occasions exeem from some human frailties and imperfections, have yet in the main conspired to daub with the untempered mortar of unbounded praise. By representing him as all perfect, all excellent, without the least mixture of alloy, was rather a devil incarnate; an abandoned monster of mankind, of insatiable avarice, unbounded ambition, implacable malice, unparalleled impudence, and shocking impiety. Such is the declamation which Lauder, in the present day, had the audacity to acknowledge as his own composition.

We will close this article with Bayle's Review of Milton's Controversial Latin Writings, for of no others he pretended to judge. 'Milton is very expert in the Latin language. No one can deny that his style is flowing, animated, and flowery; and that he has defended the people adroitly and ingeniously. But, without entering too deeply into this subject, it must be confessed, that his manner is exceptionable: it is not sufficiently serious for the importance of his subject. We see him at every moment—I do not say pouring forth sharp railleries against Mr. Salmasius; that would not injure his work, but gain the laugher's on his side attempting to be farcical, and to play off the buffoon. This censure particularly extends to his two answers of Mr. Morus. They are replete with outrageous jests. The character of the author here appears without a mask; he is one of those satiric geniuses, who indeed are too fond of collecting all the disadvantageous reports of others, and of having written, by the enemies of another, all the calumnies they know; but who feel a greater gratification to insert those calumnies in the first libel they publish against any one.'

I hope this heavy charge laid to our great poet is not just. He felt great provocations from Salmasius and Morus; and he was deeply concerned in one of the greatest political tical revolutions. Surely, the sublime conceptions of Milton could not descend to collect the tattle of Scandal. To do this, one must have a mind as little, and a heart as rancorous, as some of our modern versificators.

It was the quaint criticism of the wits, when this great poet published his Epics, that in his Paradise Lost they could sind Milton; but in his Paradise Regained he was lost. Does not this just criticism tend to shew, that these poems were more read in that time than we suppose?

TRIALS AND PROOFS OF GUILT IN EU-

It is a melancholy contemplation to reflect on the strange trials to which, in the remoter ages, those suspected of guilt were put. The Ordeal consisted of various kinds: walking blindfold amidst heated plough-shares; passing through two fires; holding in the hand a red-hot bar; and plunging the hand into boiling water. Challenging the accuser to single combat, when frequently the stoutest champion was allowed to supply their place;

the swallowing a morsel of consecrated bread; the sinking or swimming in a river for witchcrast; and various others. Though sometimes these might be eluded by the artistice of the priest, what numbers of innocent victims have been sacrificed to such barbarous superstitions!

In the twelfth century they were very common. Hildebert, Bithop of Mans, being accused of high-treason by our William Rusus, was preparing to undergo one of these trials; when Ives, Bishop of Chartres, convinced him that they were against the canons of the constitutions of the church, and adds, that in this manner Innocentiam defendere, est innocentiam perdere.

An Abbot of Saint Aubin of Angers, who lived in 1066, having refused to present a horse to the Viscount of Touars, which the Viscount claimed in right of his lordship, whenever an Abbot first took possession of the said abbey; the Ecclesiastic offered to justify himself by the trial of the ordeal, or by duel, for which he proposed to furnish a man. The Viscount, at first, agreed to the duel; but, restecting that these combats; though sanctioned by the church, depended wholly wholly on the stall or vigour of the adversary, and could therefore afford no substantial proof of the equity of his claim, he proposed to compromise the matter in a manner which strongly characterizes the times: he waved his claim, on condition that the Abbot should not forget to mention, in his prayers, himself, his wife, and his brothers! As the orifons appeared to the Abbot, in comparison with the borse, of little or no value, he accepted the proposal.

Pope Eugene approved of, and even introduced, the trial by immersion in cold water.

It was about that/time, also, that those who were accused of robbery, were put to trial by a piece of barley-bread, on which the mass had been said; and, if they could not swallow it, they were declared guilty. This mode of trial was improved, by adding to the bread a slice of cheese; and such were the credulity and firm dependence on Heaven in these ridiculous trials, that they were very particular in the composition of this holy bread and cheese. The bread was to be of unleavened barley, and the cheese made of ewe's milk of the month of May, no other of the twelve menths having any power to detect a criminal.

Du Cange has observed, that the expression we long have employed—' May this piece of bread choak me!' comes from this cuitom.

The anecdote of Earl Godwin's death by swallowing a piece of bread, in making this affeveration, is recorded in our history. If it be true, it was a singular missortune.

Voltaire says, that they were acquainted in those times with fecrets to pass, unhurt, these singular trials. He particularly mentions one for undergoing that of boiling water. These are his words—' The whole secret is said to consist in rubbing one's self a long time with the spirit of vitriol and allum, together with the juice of an onion. None of the Academies of Science, in our days, have attempted to verify, by experiments, a truth well known to quacks and mountebanks.'

But, amongst these trials, not the least ridiculous was that of the bleeding of a corpse. If a person was murdered, it was said that, at the touch, or at the approach, of the murderer, 5 murderer, the blood gushed out of the body in various parts. This was, once allowed in England; and is still looked on, in some of the uncivilized parts of these kingdoms, as a detection of the criminal. forms a rich picture to the imagination of our old writers; and their narrations and ballads are laboured into pathos by dwelling on this phenomenon. Yet, what is this evidence in the eyes of the enlightened philosopher! It does not always happen in the presence of the murderer; it bleeds suddenly in that of the innocent: and is it not natural to suppose, that 'when a body is full of blood, warmed by a fudden external heat, having been considerably stirred or moved, and a putrefaction coming on, some of the blood-vessels should burst, as it is certain they all will in time?'

For this last ingenious remark I am indebted to the Encyclopedia Britannica.

MUTUAL PERSECUTION.

The Pagans were accustomed to accuse the Christians of being the cause of the evils which affected the Roman empire, as Origen remarks in his C. xxiv. on St. Matthew; St. Cyprian, in the commencement of his book ad Demetrianum; Tertullian, in his 40 C. of his Apology; and Arnobius, in his first book. When, in it's turn, Christianity became the prevailing religion, the Christians accused the Jews and the Pagans of trawing on the empire the calamities which then happened.

The Christians appear frequently fighting amongst themselves. Ammianus Marcellinus says, that the Christians of his age tore themselves to pieces like so many wild beasts. Chap. 5.

Crevier, in his History of the Roman Emperors, informs us, that when they prepared in France for the conquest of Jeru-salem, and other holy places, the fanatic preachers preachers every where declared that they should begin the croisade by massacring the Jews, which they held to be a most meritorious action. The poor Israelites had been nearly exterminated but for the interference of St. Bernard, who luckily bappened to be of opinion that they might be allowed to live. The Jews, when Judaism was more in fashion than it is at present, did certainly treat as ill the Girgashites, the Hittites, and other nations whose names I cannot recollect. For above a century the Catholics and Protestants reciprocally cut each other's throats: and all this for the Love of God.

Je ne décide point entre Geneve et Rome—

Périsse à jamais l'affreuse politique,

Qui prétend sur les cœurs un pouvoir despotique,

Qui veut le ser en main convertir les mortels,

Qui du sang heretique arrose les Autels,

RELIGIOUS ENMITY.

ITHINK the present article, which I have drawn from Naudé, while it contains some interesting anecdotes, is just and philosophical.

When I was at Rome, I could not help telling many devotees, that when Religion seizes and overpowers the mind, it makes it consider actions and characters through the medium of interest, and hence it should not be relied on. For instance: the ancient sathers have said every thing they could imagine to depreciate the character of Julian the Apostate. Though they would not have done this, had he not proved an apostate and a persecutor of the Christians; they do not in the slightest manner notice his many eminent qualities. He was rigorously oully just, a man of strict morals, and a great politician. See what Montaigne and La Mothe le Vayer observe of him; and particularly his character, elaborately delineated by Mr. Gibbon.

Constantine murdered his brother-inlaw, his nephew at 12 years of age, his fatherin-law, his own son, and his wife—This wretch seigned to sound Constantinople by order of God—This supposed Revelation shews his character—He is extolled by the Christians to be one of the greatest of men, because he thought proper to burn Christians for a vile political purpose.

persecutor, as the Christians defame him, gave them full enjoyment of their liberty 20. The years of his reign. It was only two years before his death that he, with other Emperors, punished them for state reasons. On the contrary, he had suffered them to grow so numerous that they became too mong for him. Read the Monkish account of Diocletian.

It is thus also in Venice. Anthony Bragadin passes for a martyr, because he was:
flayed alive at the command of Mustapha,...
after

after the taking of Famagusta. But the fact is, that the Turks are only like other men; and they thus punished Bragadin, and his other Christian captains, because, when they saw they must be taken by Mustapha, they barbarously cut the throats of all their Turkish prisoners.

'It is owing also to this cause, that the devotees say every thing savourable of Mary Stuart, Queen of Scotland, because she attended mass very constantly; though it must be consessed, that her conduct was seldom regulated by decency and morality. I saw, at Rome—adds Naudé—the letters she wrote to the Earl of Bothwell, Subactori suo. And I cannot but believe whatever has been said of her by Buchanan and De Thou.'

Voltaire has defended the character of Jane of Naples. She appears to have resembled Mary. Men of genius are oftner pleased with paradox than with truth.

It was thus likewise the prejudiced Purktans treated Marlowe, a poet well known to the readers of Old English Poetry. Marlowe had in his life time treated with great freedom sacred subjects. His sentiments, which which now so many profess without sear of exciting the enmity of the religious, these men construed into absolute Atheism, as Warton observes. Marlowe having been assassinated in an amorous adventure, they took pains to represent the unfortunate catastrophe of his untimely death, as an immediate judgment from Heaven upon his execrable impiety! Such opinions are promulgated at every hour by the bigot, who always sees in the missortunes of his enemy the judgment of Heaven.

INQUISITION.

INNOCENT the Third, a Pope as enterprizing as he was successful in his enterprizes, having sent Dominic, with some missionaries, into Languedoc, these men so irritated the Heretics they were sent to convert, that most of them were assistanted at Toulouse, in the year 1200. It was then he called in for aid temporal arms, and published against them a cruisade; granting, as is usual with the Popes on similar occaVol. I. Y sions, fions, all kinds of indulgences and pardons to those who should arm against these Mahometans, as he stiled these unsortunate men. Raimond, Count of Toulouse, was constrained to submit. The inhabitants were passed on the edge of the sword, without distinction of age or sex. It was then he established that scourge of Europe, THE INQUISITION: for having considered that, though all might be compelled to submit by arms, there might remain numbers who would profess particular dogmas, he established this sanguinary tribunal solely to inspect into all families, and examine all persons who they imagined were unfriendly to the interests of Rome. Dominic did so much by his cares and continued persecutions, that he firmly established it at Toulouse.

It was as late as 'the year 1484 that it became known in Spain. It was also to a Dominican, John de Torquemada, that the Court of Rome owed this obligation. As he was the Confessor of Queen Isabella, he had extorted from her a promise that, if ever she ascended the throne, she would use every means to extirpate Heresy and Heretics.

and had chaced from the Spanish realms multitudes of unfortunate Moors. A few had remained; who, with the Jews, he obliged to become Christians: they at least assumed the name; but it was well known that both these nations naturally respected their own prejudices, rather than those of the Christians.

lation would greatly hurt the interests of the Holy Religion. The queen listened with respectful dissidence to her consessor; and at length gained over the king to consent to the establishment of this barbarous tribunal. Torquemeda, indefatigable in his zeal for the holy seat, in the space of sourteen years that he exercised the office of chief inquisitor, persecuted near eighty thousand persons, of whom six thousand were condemned to the slames!

Voltaire attributes the taciturnity of the Spaniards to the universal horror such proceedings spread. He says—'A general jealousy and suspicion took possession of all ranks of people: friendship and sociability were all at an end! Brothers were afraid of brothers; fathers of their children.'

Let us contemplate a slight sketch of that Despotism which, with the destruction of the Bastile, we hope is extinguished throughout Europe.

During the pontificate of Sixtus the Fifth, the Inquisition was powerful and rigorous in Rome. Muretus, in writing to De Thou the historian, says—'We do not know what becomes of the people here. Almost every day, when I rise, I hear, with an alarming surprize, how such an one has disappeared. We dare not whisper our suspicions: the Inquisition would be immediately at our doors.'

Taverner, in his Travels, informs us, that a man of letters, who had fallen into the hands of the inquisitors, said, that nothing troubled him so much as the ignorance of the inquisitor and his council when they put any question; so that he was inclined to believe that not one of them had really read the Scriptures!

Dr. Grainger affords us a curious piece of information. He assures us, that in his remembrance membrance, a horse, that had been taught to tell the spots upon cards, the hour of the day, &c. by fignificant tokens, was, together with his owner, put into the Inquisition for both of them dealing with the devil!— This man, perhaps, should have been placed amongst the persecuted Learned. The man who teaches a horse, in the present day, will be much better paid than the philosopher who instructs his scholars.

The Inquisition have chosen to punish heretics by fire, in preference to any other punishment; because (Bayle assures us) it is to elude the maxim, Ecclefia non novit fanguinem, which they conceive to be observed in these punishments; as burning a man, they say, does not break his bones, or shed his blood!—Religion has her quibbles as well as Law.

Although we imagine that the fires of this terrible tribunal are extinguished, it's askes may yet kindle. It was only as far back as the year 1761, that Gabriel Malagrida, an old man of seventy, was burnt by these evangelical executioners. His trial was printed at Amsterdam, 1762, from the Lisbon copy. And for what was this unhappy Jesuit Jesuit condemned? Not, as some have imagined, for his having been concerned in a conspiracy against the King of Portugal. No other charge is laid to him in this trial but that of having indulged certain heretical notions, which any other tribunal than that of the Inquisition would have looked upon as the delirious fancies of an old fanatic. Will posterity believe that, in the eighteenth century, an aged visionary was led to the stake, for having said, amongst other extravagancies, that—'The holy Virgin having commanded him to write the Life of Anti-Christ, told him that he, Malagrida, was a second John, but more clear than John the Evangelist: that there were to be three Anti-Christs, and that the last should be born at Milan, of a Monk and a Nun, in the year 1920; and that he would marry Proserpine, one of the infernal furies.'

It was for such ravings as these the unhappy old man was burnt; which, I repeat once more, was only thirty years ago!

SINGULARITIES OBSERVED BY VARIOUS NATIONS IN THEIR REPASTS.

I HAVE collected from a very curious book, entitled—' L'Esprit des Usages et des Coutumes,' the greater part of the present article.

The Maldivian Islanders eat alone. They retire into the most hidden parts of their houses; and they draw down the cloths that serve as blinds to their windows, that they may eat unobserved. This custom probably arises—remarks our philosophic author—from the savage, in the early periods of society, concealing himself to eat: he fears that another, with as sharp an appetite, but more strong than himself, should come and ravish his meal from him. Besides, the ideas of Witchcraft are widely spread among Barbarians; and they are not a little fearful that some incantation may be thrown amongst their victuals.

In noticing the folitary meal of the Maldivian Islander, another reason may be al-Y 4 kedged ledged for this misanthropical repast. They never will eat with any one who is inferior to them in birth, in riches, or dignity; and, as it is a difficult matter to settle this equality, they are condemned to lead this unsociable life.

On the contrary, the Islanders of the Philippines are remarkably sociable. Whenever one of them finds himself without a companion to partake of his meal, he runs till he meets with one; and, we are assured, that however keen his appetite may be, he ventures not to satisfy it without a guest.

Savages, (says Montaigne) when they eat, 'S' essupent les doigts aux cuisses, à la bourse des génitoires, et à la plante des pieds.' It is impossible to translate this passage without offending feminine delicacy; nor can we forbear exulting in the polished convenience of napkins!

The tables of the rich Chinese shine with a beautiful varnish, and are covered with silk carpets very elegantly worked. They do not make use of plates, knives, or forks: every guest has two little ivory or ebony sticks, which he handles very adroitly.

The Otaheiteans, who are lovers of fociety, ciety, and very gentle in their manners, feed separate from each other. At the hour of repast, the members of each family divide; two brothers, two sisters, and even husband and wife, father and mother, have each their respective basket. They place themselves at the distance of two or three yards from each other; they turn their backs, and take their meal in prosound silence.

The custom of drinking, at different hours from those assigned for eating, is to be met with amongst many savage nations. It was originally begun from necessity. It became an habit, which subsisted even when the fountain was near to them. 'A people transplanted,' observes our ingenious philosopher, 'preserve, in another climate, modes of living which relate to those from whence they originally came. It is thus the Indians of Brazil scrupulously abstain from eating when they drink, and from drinking when they eat.'

When neither decency or politeness are known, the man who invites his friends to a repast, is greatly embarrassed to testify his esteem for his guests, and to present them with some amusement; for the savage guest imposes imposes on him this obligation. Amongst the greater part of the American Indians, the host is continually on the watch to solicit them to eat, but touches nothing himself. In New France, he wearies himself with singing, to divert the company while they eat.

When civilization advances, we wish to shew our confidence to our friends: we treat them as relations; and it is said that, in China, the master of the house, to give a mark of his politeness, absents himself while his guests regale themselves at his table with undisturbed revelry.

The demonstrations of friendship, in a rude state, have a savage and gross character, which it is not a little curious to observe. The Tartars pull a man by the ear, to press him to drink; and they continue tormenting him till he opens his mouth. It is then they clap their hands and dance before him.

No customs seem more ridiculous than those practised by a Kamtschadale, when he wishes to make another his friend. He sirst invites him to eat. The host and his guest strip themselves in a cabin, which is heated to an uncommon degree. While the guest devours the food with which they serve him, the other continually stirs the fire. The stranger must bear the excess of the heat as well as of the repast. He vomits ten times before he will yield; but, at length, obliged to acknowledge himself overcome, he begins to compound matters. He purchases a moment's respite by a present of cloaths or dogs; for his host threatens to heat the cabin, and to oblige him to eat till he dies. The stranger has the right of retaliation allowed to him: he treats in the same manner, and exacts the same presents. Should his host not accept the invitation of his guest, whom he has so handsomely regaled, he would come and inhabit his cabin till he had obtained from him the presents he had in fo singular a manner given to him.

For this extravagant custom a curious reason has been alledged. It is meant to put the person to a trial whose friendship is sought. The Kamtschadale, who is at the expence of the fires and the repast, is desirous to know if the stranger has the strength to support pain with him, and if he

he is generous enough to share with him some part of his property. While the guest is employed on his meal, he continues heating the cabin to an insupportable degree; and, for a last proof of the stranger's constancy and attachment, he exacts more cloaths and more dogs. The host passes through the same ceremonies in the cabin of the stranger; and he shews, in his turn, with what degree of fortitude he can defend his friend. It is thus the most singular customs would appear simple, if it were possible for the philosopher to contemplate them on the spot.

As a distinguishing mark of their esteem, the Negroes of Ardra drink out of one cup at the same time. The King of Loango eats in one house and drinks in another. A Kamtschadale kneels before his guest; he cuts an enormous slice from a sea-calf; he crams it entire into the mouth of his friend, furiously crying out—'Tana!'—There! and, cutting away what hangs about his lips, snatches and swallows it with avidity.

A barbarous magnificence attended the feasts of the ancient Monarchs of France.

We

We are informed that, after their coronation or confecration, when they fat at table, the nobility served them on horseback.

DISPENSATIONS FOR MARRIAGE.

who introduced the custom of Dispenfations for Marriage. It was occasioned by William the Conqueror, who, having espoused Matilda, daughter of Baldwin the Fifth, Count of Flanders, who was related to him in a prohibited degree, the Pope permitted him to live with her, on condition of him and Matilda each founding an abbey. In this business it appears, the Pope got two abbeys for nothing; and, he who had conquered all Europe, could not vanquish the fears of religious prejudice.

ENGLISH LADIES.

IT is necessary to premise, that the present strictures concerning our Country, our Divines, Divines, and our lovely Country-Women, were written in the days when our great grandmothers were Misses.

Menage says—'Mr. D. tells me that, in England, the public places are crouded with the daughters and the wives of the Clergy. The reason is, that the livings there, being very fat ones, all the English Ladies who are fond of their ease and good living, and who are more partial to the present hour than to the future, are in raptures to marry a Parson; who, on his side, never fails, according to the character of a good Ecclefiastic, of selecting the most beautiful. After his death, mother and daughters find themselves probably in the greatest distress; and as they are in general very bandsome, they put into practice all their smiles and all their graces; and, for this reason, chuse the public reforts of Fashion where they may attract notice. We Catholics should be grateful to the Council of Trent, that prohibited our Ecclesiastics from marriage, and thus obviated the inconveniencies which such marriages produce.

SPANISH MONKS.

THE Monks in Spain have introduced a custom which is very useful to them. It is, that the money to pay the masses which a dying man orders to be said for him, must be paid out of the estate he leaves, in preference to all his debts. The Spaniards, who seem to have a terrible dread of his Satanic Majesty, order frequently so great a number of masses, that too often there remains little or nothing for their unfortunate heirs and creditors. On these occasions, they say, in their humorous way—'Mr. Such-an-one bas left his Soul bis beir.' A Spanish monarch ordered 100,000 masses to be said for him.

MONARCHS.

SAINT Chrysostom has a very acute obfervation on Kings. There are many monarchs, narchs, he says, who are infected with the strange wish that their successors may turn out bad princes. Good kings desire it, as they imagine—continues this pious politician—that their glory will thus appear the more splendid; and the bad desire it, as they consider such kings will serve to countenance their own misdemeanors.

Princes, says Balthasar Gracian, are willing to be aided, but not surpassed. This maxim Amelot de la Houssaie illustrates by the following anecdote. A Spanish lord having frequently played at chess with Philip II. and won all the games, perceived, when his majesty rose from play, that he was much disturbed, and felt a profound chagrin. The lord when he returned home, said to his family—My children, we have nothing more to do at court: there we must expect no favour; for the king is offended at my having won of him every game of chess.—This was not an unjust observation; for, as chess entirely depends on the genius of the players, and not on fortune, it was no wonder that Philip, himself a chess-player, should be jealous of the superior sagacity of his rival.

There is an anecdote in Mr. Twis's second volume of Chess, p. 265, which will make this appear still more clear. The Earl of Sunderland, minister to George I. was partial to the game of chess. He once played with the Laird of Cluny, and the learned Cunningham, the editor of Horace. Cunningham, with too much skill and too much sincerity, beat his lordship. 'The Earl was so fretted at his superiority and sturliness, that he disinissed him without any reward. Cluny allowed himself sometimes to be beaten; and by that means got his pardon, with something handsome besides.'

Pliny the younger, in praising the Emperor Trajan for intreating instead of commanding, says, that—' The most powerful manner of governing, is to intreat, as you do, at the very moment when you can command.' The prayers of the Great are so many orders.

In the Criticon of Gracian, there is an anecdote relative to kings, which I shall give for its singularity.

A great Polish monarch having quitted his companions when he was hunting, his Vol. I. Z courtiers courtiers found him, a few days after, in a market-place, disguised as a porter, and lending out the use of his shoulders for a few pence. At this they were as much furprized, as they were doubtful whether the porter could be his majesty. At length they ventured to express their complaints, that so great a personage should debase himself by so vile an employ. His majesty heard, and answered them- 'Upon my honour, gentlemen, the load which I quitted is by far heavier than the one you see me carry here: the weightiest is but a straw, when compared to that world under which I laboured. I have slept more in four nights. than I have during all my reign. I begin to live, and to be king of myself. Elect whom you chuse. For me, who am so well, it were madness to return to court.'-Another Polish king, who succeeded this philosophic monarch and porter, when they placed the sceptre in his hand, exclaimed— I had rather manage an oar. Kings seem to be more philosophic in Poland than elsewhere.

There are two excellent observations on Kings,

Kings, made by the Duke of Alva, an experienced politician, to a courtier.—"Kings," faid he, "who affect to be familiar with their companions, make use of men as they do of oranges: they take oranges to extract their juice; and when they are well sucked they throw them away. Take care the king does not do the same to you; be careful that he does not read all your thoughts; otherwise he will throw you to the back of his chest, as a book of which he has read enough."

—The first of these observations the King of Prussia applied to himself in his dispute with Voltaire.

THE VIRGIN MARY.

When Melchior Inchoffer, a Jesuit, published a book to vindicate a miracle of a Letter which the Virgin Mary had addressed to the citizens of Messina, Naudé brought him serious proofs of it's evident forgery. Inchosser ingenuously confessed, that he knew it was an imposture, but that he did it by the orders of his superiors. The honest and indignant indignant Naudé observes- It is thus errors and illusions are spread about the world; and thus it is, that simple minds are deceived every day!' There is no danger, in the present times, of our being cheated by Letters from the Virgin Mary. That post-office which yielded such considerable revenues to the Ecclesiastics, has been closed this century past. What a revolution has there taken place in the human mind! The most enlightened writers about 1600 to 1650, are either seriously combating, or seriously defending Miracles! Patin very cautiously ventures to say, that he thinks there are no Magicians, nor Sorcerers! He believes, however, in Apparitions and Devils!

Since I have got the Virgin Mary in my mind, I recollect a Donation made to her by Louis the Eleventh: nor can I but approve of the manner he employed to present her with this pious gift. He made a solemn donation of the whole county of Boulogne to the Holy Virgin—retaining, however, for his own use, the Revenues! This act bears the date of the year 1478; and it is thus entitled: the translation is literal— Conveyance of Louis the Eleventh, to the Virgin of Boulogne, of the right and title of the fief and homage of the county of Boulogne, which is held by the Count of Saint Pol, to render a faithful account before the Image of the faid Lady.'

Maria Agreda, a religious Visionary, wrote the Life of the Virgin. She informs us, that the refifted the commands of God and the holy Mary, till the year 1637, when the then began to compose this curious rhapfody. When the had finithed this original production, her confessor advised her to This she did. Her friends, howburn it. ever, who did not think her less inspired than fhe informed them she was, advised her to re-write the work. When it was printed, it spread rapidly from country to country: new additions appeared at Lisbon, Madrid, Perpignan, and Anvers. There are so many pious absurdities in this book, and which were found to give fuch pleafure to the devout, that it was folemnly honoured with the Cenfure of the Sorbonne, and which, indeed, was one great cause of spreading it the more.

The brain of this lady was certainly ill with religion. In the first six chapters, she relates the visions of the Virgin, which appeared, to induce her to write her Life. She begins this History early enough; ab ovo, as it may be justly expressed; for she has formed a narrative of what passed during the nine months in which the Virgin was confined in the womb of her mother St. Anne. After the birth of Mary, she received an augmentation of angelic Guards; gives us very correctly several conversations which God held with the Virgin, during the first eighteen months after her birth. And it is in this manner she formed a Romance, which may be fairly described by observing that it was a circulating novel, which delighted the female devotees of the Seventeenth Century.

On the worship paid to the Virgin Mary in Spain and Italy, it may be said, that it exceeds that which is given to the Son or the Father. When they pray to Mary, their imagination pictures a beautiful woman, and they really feel a passion. Jesus is only regarded as a Bambino, or Infant, and the Father is hardly ever recollected; but the Madona, Madona, La Senbora, La Maria fanta, while she inspires their religious inclinations, indulges also their amatorial propensities.

PROTESTANTS.

We have frequently heard the oppressed Protestants bitterly complain of the Catholic tyranny. What I now transcribe from Patin, will shew that there is something to be said on the other side. The stubborn bigot is alarmed; religious distinctions have been, however, since his days, wearing sast away; and, as Philosophy enlightens the mind, the heart insensibly will become more moral, though not so religious.

All the Huguenots—or Protestants—of Europe, will one day agree together, and occasion a general revolt, under the name of Religion; particularly, whenever they shall have for their chief an enterprizing genius like that of the King of Sweden—Charles the Twelfth. I fear those people (he says contemptuously) if they get the upper hand fivagely, and very differently from what we do them (witness the massacre of St. Bartholomew, and the long slourishing state of the inquisition.) They will not even suffer us to hold our mass, as we permit them their service. The Huguenots are dangerous politicians; insolent, and unmerciful, as they have lately shewn us in England (the decapitation of Charles the First) and in France, during the troubles of the Prince de Condé, in 1562.'

When Patin wrote this, it must be recollected that, as he turned his eyes on England, he had before him the austere and persecuting Puritans, with Cromwell at their head.

COFFEE.

It is curious to observe the description Purchas—of whom an account has been given in the first part of this work—gives us of Coffee, when yet it had not been introduced into Europe. He writes, that 'the Turks'

Turks have Coffa-houses more common than ale-houses with us; in or near to which, on benches in the street, they will sit chatting most of the day, drinking their Coffa—so called of a berry it is made of—as hot as they can endure it. It is black as soot, and tastes not much unlike it: good, they say, for digestion and mirth. The second edition of this book was published in 1625. Coffee was introduced into England by Mr. Edwards, a Turkish merchant, in the year 1652.

Mr. Gough, in his British Topography, however, says, that one Jobson, a Jew, set up the first Cossee-house, at Oxford, in 1650. Arthur Tillyard, Apothecary, sold it publicly in his own house, 1655; and Jobson, afterwards, in London, 1671.

OF THE TITLES OF ILLUSTRIOUS—HIGH-NESS—AND EXCELLENCE.

THE title of Illustrious was never given, till the reign of Constantine, but to those whose reputation was splendid in arms or in letters.

letters. Flattery had not yet adopted this noble word into her vocabulary, Suetonius has composed a book, to mention those who had possessed this title; and, as it was then bestowed, a moderate book was sufficient to contain their names.

In the time of Constantine, the title of Illustrious was given more particularly to those princes who had distinguished themselves in war: but it was not consinued to their descendants. At length, it became very common; and every son of a prince was Illustrious. It is now a word of little fignisication; it is, however, very serviceable to the poet, who employs it frequently as a convenient epithet to complete the measure of his verse.

A French critic has well observed, that there is a very proper distinction to be made between the epithets of ILLUSTRIOUS and FAMOUS.

Niceron has entitled his celebrated work,

Memoirès pour servir à l'histoire des Hommes

Illustres dans la Republique des Lettres.

The epithet Illustrious is always received in an honourable sense; yet, in these Memoirs are inserted many authors, who have

have only written with the design of combating religion and morality. Such writers as Vanini, Spinosa, Woolston, Toland, &c., had been better characterized under the more general epithet of Famous; for it may be said, that the Illustrious are Famous, but that the Famous are not always Illustrious.

refs was only given to kings; but now it has become so common, that all the great houses assume it. All the Great, says a modern, are desirous of being confounded with princes, and are ready to seize on the privileges of royal dignity. We are already arrived to Highness. The pride of our descendants, I suspect, will usurp that of Manielly.

Ferdinand, King of Arragan, and his Queen Isabella, of Castile, were only treated with the title of Highness. Charles was the first who took that of Majesty; not in his quality of King of Spain, but as Emperor.

Formerly kings were apostrophized by the title of Your Grace. Henry VIII. was the first (says Houssaie) who assumed the title of Highness; and at length Majesty. It was Francis Francis I. who began to give him this last title, in their interview in the year 1520.

So distinct were once the titles of Highness and Excellence, that when Don Juan, the brother of Philip II. was permitted to take up the latter title, when the city of Grenada saluted him by the title of Highness, it occasioned some serious jealousy at court; and had he persisted in it, he would probably have been condemned for treason.

After all these historical notices respecting these titles, the reader will smile, when he is acquainted with the reason of an honest curate, of Montserrat, who resused to bestow the title of Highness on the Duke of Mantova, because he found in his breviary these words, Tu solus Dominus, tu salus Altissimus; from all which he concluded, that none but the Lord was to be honoured with the title of Highness!

JOAN OF ARC.

Or the Maid of Orleans, I have somewhere read that a bundle of faggots was made made to supply her place, when she was supposed to have been burnt by the Duke of Bedford. None of our historians notice this anecdote; though fome have mentioned that, after her death, an impostor arose, and was even married to a French gentleman, by whom she had several children. Whether she deserved to have been distinguished by the appellation of The maid of Orleans we have great reason to suspect; and fome, in her days, by her fondness for man's apparel, even doubted her fex. The following Epitaph on her I find in a volume, entitled, 'Historical Rarities;' and which, possessing great humour, merits to be refcued from total oblivion. I cannot difcover it's original publication.

Here lies Joan of Arc; the which Some count Saint, and some count Witch; Some count Man, and some thing more; Some count Maid, and some a Whore. Her Life's in question, wrong or right; Her Death's in doubt, by laws or might. Oh, Innocence! take heed of it, How thou too near to Guilt doth sit. (Meantime, France a wonder saw—A woman rule, 'gainst Salique law!)

350 HISTORICAL ANECDOTES,

But, reader, be content to stay

Thy censure till the Judgment Day;

Then shalt thou know, and not before,

Whether Saint, Witch, Man; Maid, or Where.

With the old French poets it was usual to compare our heroine to Hercules. Mean of wit can always make resemblances, if they cannot find them. Malherbe, when he touched on this topic, only founds his resemblance in the similarity of their death. He inveighs with just force against the enemy, for the ungenerous revenge they took in burning this fair Amazon. But Fate, he says, was not blameable in this; for she, who had lived like Alcides, should die as he died. The conceit is not unhappy, nor the verses inelegant.

L'Ennemi tout droit violant,
Belle Amazone, en vous brûlant, Témoigna son ame perfide;
Mais le destin n'eut point de tort,
Celle qui vivoit comme Alcide, Devoit mourir comme il est mort.

TRANSUBSTANTIATION.

In his account of the Mexicans, Abbé Raynal says—'They had a piece of super-stition, of which no traces can be found in any other country. On certain days, the priests made a statue of passe, which they sent to the oven to be baked: they then placed it on an altar, where it became a divinity! Innumerable crowds slocked to the temple: the priest cut the statue in pieces, and distributed a portion of it to all the persons in the assembly, who ate it, and thought they were sanctified by swallowing their god!

Did the Abbé forget the rites of bis own religion, when he observes—'No traces of this superstition can be found in any other country?' Is not all this only a simple description of the nonsense of Transubstantiation? The fact is, that Raynal was thus obliged to veil, by the recital of a supposed fact, the allusion he made to this Catholic folly. The recital of history frequently, when when applied to our own times, forms the severest satire.

Ridley, Bishop of London, (Grainger obferves) in his disputes with the Roman Catholic divines, forced them to acknowledge that Christ, in his last supper, held himself in bis band, and afterwards eat bimself!

The same writer remarks, that almost all the martyrs in the cruel reign of Mary, died for denying the doctrine of real presence, which was made the test of what was called Herefy.

AMERICA.

'IT is computed, by able writers,' fays my Lord Kaimes, 'that the present inhabitants of America amount not to a twentieth part of those who existed when that continent was discovered by Columbus. This decay is ascribed to the intemperate use of spirits, and to the small-pox, both of them introduced by the Europeans.' He seems to have forgotten that they are indebted to us also for 'the intemperate use' of the sword, fword, and the dreadful bigotry and cruelties practifed by the religious and avaricious Spaniards, which certainly are not less destructive than the contagion of the smallpox, or the poison of spirituous liquors.

We may also add another proof of European humanity. A plantation in Jamaica, which employs a bundred slaves, requires an annual recruit of no fewer than feven, who fall the yearly victims to the cruelties of the lower overseers, who follow them all day with whips!

Bartholomew Casa affirms, that the Spaniards, in America, destroyed, in about forty-five years, ten millions of human souls! and this with a view of converting these unfortunate men to Christianity. He tells us that they hanged those unhappy men thirteen in a row, in honour of the thirteen Apostles! And they also gave their infants to be devoured by their dogs! There is a story recorded of an Indian, who, being tied to the stake, a Franciscan Friar persuaded him to turn Christian, and then he would go to heaven. The Indian asked him-Whether there were any Spaniards in heaven?'-'Certainly,' the Friar answered; 'it Vol. I. Aa is full of them.'—'Then,' the last words of the dying Indian were, 'I had rather go to hell, than have any more of their company!'

Corsini tells us, that they destroyed above fisteen millions of these unhappy men in less than sifty years; and gives this curious observation, that the blood of these devoted victims, added to that of the slaves destroyed in the mines, where they were compelled to labour, would weigh as much as all the gold and silver that had been dug out of them. It is also proper to observe, that the apology they formed to extenuate this dreadful inhumanity was, that God had not redeemed with his blood the souls of the Indians, and that therefore there was no difference to be made between them and the lowest species of beasts!

ENCHANTED TAPESTRY.

ABOUT the year 1526, the Portuguese attempted to settle at Borneo. Too seeble to make their arms respected, they tried to gain the good-will of one of the Sovereigns of the country, by offering him some Tapestry. This weak Prince took the figures wrought on it for enchanted men, who would strangle him in the night-time, if he suffered them to approach his person. The explanations they gave to remove his apprehensions had no effect: he obstinately resused to permit the present to be brought into his palace; and, at the same time, prohibited the donors from entering his capital. Had his Majesty been acquainted with the Æneid of Virgil, he might have exclaimed what, for the benefit of the Ladies, we shall give in Dryden's version—

Somewhat is sure design'd, by fraud or force: Trust not their presents, nor admit the horse!

THE GREAT AND LITTLE TURK.

TITLES frequently remain when the occasions of making them are forgotten. Perhaps few know why the Ottoman Emperor is called The Great Turk: it is not, as some have imagined, to distinguish him from his own subjects. This was the occasion. Mahaman A a 2 homet homet the Second was the first of these Emperors on whom the Christians bestowed the title of the Great Turk. It was not owing to his great actions that this splendid title was accorded to him, but to the vast extent of his dominions, in comparison with those of the Sultan of Iconia, or Cappadocia, his contempotary, who was distinguished by the title of The Little Turk. After the taking of Constantinople, Mahomet the Second deprived the latter of his domains; and still preserved the title of the Great Turk, though the propriety of it, by this accident, was lost.

THE POULIATS, AND THE POULICHES.

THE present article, which I have drawn from Abbé Raynal, presents two pictures of the debasement of the human race, which, perhaps, History has never paralleled.

There is a tribe amongst the Indians which is the resule of the rest. The members of it are employed in the meanest offices of society. They bury the dead, carry away dirt, dirt, and live upon the flesh of animals that die natural deaths. They are prohibited from entering into the temples and public markets; neither are they allowed the use of the wells, that are common to all their inhabitants. Their dwellings are at the extremity of the towns, or consist of folitary cottages in the country; and they are even forbidden to appear in the streets where the Bramins reside. As all other Indians, they may employ themselves in the labours of agriculture: but only for the benefit of the other tribes; for they are not permitted to have lands of their own, not even upon lease. Such is the degree of horror they excite, that if, by chance, they were to touch any one not belonging to their tribe, they would be deprived, with impunity, of a life reckoned too abject to deserve the protection of the laws. Most of them are employed in the culture of rice. Near the fields where they carry on this work, there is a kind of hut, into which they retire when they hear a cry, which always comes from a distance, to give them notice of some order from the person on whom they depend; to which they anfwer, not coming out of their retreat. They' take take the same precautions whenever they are warned, by a consused kind of noise, of the approach of any man whatever. If they have not time to hide themselves, they fall prostrate on the ground, with their faces downwards, with all the marks of humiliation which the sense of their disgrace can suggest.

Whenever the harvests do not answer to the avidity of an oppressive master, he sometimes cruelly fets fire to the huts of these unhappy labourers; and if they attempt to escape the flames, be fires upon them without mercy! The condition of these wretched people is horrible in every respect, even in the manner in which they are forced to · provide for their most urgent wants. In the dusk of the evening they come out from their retreats in bands; they direct their steps towards the market, at a certain distance from which they begin to bellow! The merchants approach; and they ask for what they want. They are supplied, and the provisions are laid on the very spot where the money destined for the payment of them has been previously deposited. When the purchasers can be assured that they shall not be seen by any one, they come out from behind the hedge where they had concealed themselves, and carry away, with precipitation, what they have acquired in so singular a manner.'

After contemplating this dishonourable picture of man, (a degeneracy in human nature which probably the reader could hardly suspect) he may deepen the philosophic reverie by what the Abbé gives us in continuation.

'Yet this very tribe of Pouliats have an inferior one among themselves, called Pouliches. These last are forbidden the use of sire; they are not permitted to build huts, but are reduced to the necessity of living in a kind of nest upon the trees, or in the forests. When pressed with hunger, they bowl like wild beasts, to excite compassion. The most charitable then deposit some rice, or other food, at the foot of a tree, and retire with all possible haste to give the samished wretch an opportunity of taking it without meeting with his benefactor, who would think him-self polluted by coming near him.'

To clear up this curious information, which stretches to the utmost the belief of the reader, the Abbé presents us with an A a 4 excellent excellent philosophical argument. This extreme disgrace,' he says, ' into which a considerable part of a numerous nation is plunged, has always appeared an inexplicable circumstance. Men of the utmost sagacity have never been able to conceive, how a people, humane and sensible, could have brought themselves to reduce their own brethren to so abject a state. To solve this difficulty, let us be permitted to hazard a conjecture. In our half barbarous governments, dreadful torments, or an ignominious death, are allotted to those criminals who have disturbed, in a greater or less degree, the peace of society. May we not therefore reasonably suppose, that, in the soft climate of India, a more moderate systern of legislature may have been satisfied with excluding from their tribes all kinds of malefactors? This punishment must appear to them sufficient to put a stop to the commissions of such crimes; and it was certainly the best adapted to a country where the effusion of blood was always forbidden by religious as well as moral principles. It would certainly have been a very proper proceeding, if the children had not inherited rited the infamy of their parents: but there were unsurmountable prejudices which militated against this reinstatement; a family never being received again into a tribe after it had been once expelled from it.'

The folution of the Abbé is ingenious and probable: but the Mosaic threat of vengeance extending to the third and fourth generation, is uncongenial to the mild spirit of humane philosophy. Yet is this threat on record in those Commandments which are said to have been written by the finger of God himself. Surely this cannot accord with the unwearied benevolence of a paternal Deity! Let us rather acknowledge, with a figh, that there are multitudes of the human race who really believe themselves to be the property of a small number of men who oppress them. The image of the Creator is so debased in some parts of the globe, that it may be said, the hand of the oppressor has effaced every mark of it's original greatness.

THE THIRTEEN CANTONS.

Wно can contemplate, without enthusiasm, the exertions of men, when they have been prompted to rely on their own force to act up to that sublime character they hold in the scale of creation, and to write with their own blood the charter of their liberty? We have just come from meditating on nations, who, beneath the enervating skies of India, destitute of the seelings of liberty, have sunk to a degree even beneath their associates who graze the field, and drink of the brook! Let us now turn our eyes to the bleak heaven, and the snowy mountains, of Switzerland, where the hardy native roams free and unconstrained, and 'knows himself a MAN.

The pride, the insolence, and the tyranny, of those governors who were given to the Helvetians, in the name of the empire, by the Dukes of Austria, awakened at once the minds of this people, who regarded freedom as their birth-right, yet whom the governors remore attempted to oppress as slaves. Three peasants resolved to preserve their liberties; and each of them collected his friends in his own burgh. In the year 1305, Switz, Uri, and Underwal, declared themselves independent; and, as the party of Switz, was the earliest in promoting this alliance, they had the honour of giving to this confederate nation the name of Swiss, and to the country that of Switzerland. The other Cantons joined them at different periods. Appendicely, the last of the Thirteen Cantons, closed this honourable confederacy in 1513.

CHARLES THE FIFTH.

CHARLES the Fifth spoke five languages: the Flemish, the German, the Spanish, the French, and the Italian. He used to say, that to employ the vulgar languages according to the use for which they were most proper, he would speak Italian to the ladies, French to men, German to horses, and Spanish to God. He used also to say, the Portuguese appeared to be madmen, and were so; the Spaniards appeared to be wife, and were not; the Italians appeared to be wife, and were so; the French appeared to be madmen, and were not—That the Germans spoke like carmen, the English like simpletons, the Italians like lovers, the French like masters, and the Spaniards like kings.

This Emperor—who, though he thus censures our English modesty, is indebted to our country for his best-written Lifewas called by the Sicilians, Scipio Africanus; by the Italians, David; by the French, Hercules; by the Turks, Julius Cæsar; by the Africans, Hannibal; by the Germans, Charlemagne; and by the Spaniards, Alexander the Great. These are the titles of adulation. One is almost tempted to call him by a groffer name, when one reflects on his folly in quitting a crown, which had long been the idol of his ambition, to fink into a folitary retreat, with a pension that was never paid to him; and, having no more the power of disturbing the tranquillity of Europe, to tyrannize over a few melancholy Monks; and, as Fenelon expresses it, 'every day to become ennuyé with having nothing to do but praying to God, winding winding his watch, and continually scolding the poor unhappy novices, whose great curse it was, to be associated with him, who had been the most-potent monarch on earth.

PHILIP THE THIRD.

PHILIP the Third, King of Spain, was a weak prince, who fuffered himself to be governed by his ministers. A patriot wished to open his eyes, but he could not pierce through the crowds of his flatterers; besides, that the voice of patriotism heard in a corrupted court would have become a crime never to have been pardoned. He found, however, an ingenious manner of conveying to him his censure. He caused to be laid on his table, one day, a letter, sealed, which bore this address—'To the King of Spain, Philip the Third, at present in the service of the duke of Lerma.'

In a fimilar manner, Don Carlos, fon to Philip the Second, made a book, with empty pages, to contain the voyages of his father; which bore this title—' The Great and and Admirable Voyages of the King, Mr. Philip.' All these voyages consisted of going to the Escurial from Madrid, and returning to Madrid from the Escurial. Jest of this kind, at length, cost him his life.

THE GOTHS AND HUNS.

THE barbarous honours which these serocious nations paid to their deceased monarchs are recorded in history, by the interment of Attila, King of the Huns; and Alaric, King of the Goths.

Attila died in 453, and was buried, in the midst of a vast champaign, in a cossin which was inclosed in one of gold, another of silver, and the third of iron. With the body were interred all the spoils of the enemy—harnesses, embroidered with gold and studded with jewels; rich silks; and whatever they had taken most precious in the palaces of the kings they had pillaged: and, that the place of his interment might for ever remain concealed, the Huns deprived of life all who had assisted at his burial.

The

The Goths had done nearly the same for Alaric, in 410, at Cosence, a town in Calabria. They turned aside the river Valento; and, having formed a grave in the midst of it's bed, where it's course was most rapid, they interred this king with prodigious accumulations of riches. After having caused the river to re-assume it's usual course, they murdered, without exception, all those who had been concerned in digging this singular grave.

ROYAL DIVINITIES.

We know, that the first Roman Emperors did not want statterers; and that the adulations they sometimes lavished were extravagant. But, perhaps, sew know they were less offensive than the statterers of the third age, under the Pagan, and of the sourth, under the Christian, Emperors. Those who are acquainted with the character of the age of Augustus, have only to throw their eyes on the one and the other code, to find an infinite number of passages which had not been been bearable in that age. For instance, here is a law of Arcadius and Honorius, published in 404.

Let the officers of the palace be warned to abstain from frequenting tumultuous meetings; and that those who, instigated by a sacrilegious temerity, dare to oppose the authority of our Divinity, shall be deprived of their employments, and their estates confiscated.' The letters they write are boly. When the sons speak of their fathers, it is-'Their father of divine memory;' or-'Their divine father.' They call their own laws oracles, and celestial oracles. So also their subjects address them by the titles of - Your Perpetuity-your Eternity.' And it appears by a law of Theodore the Great, that the Emperors, at length, added this to their titles. It begins thus—'If any magiftrate, after having concluded a public work, put his name rather than that of our Perpetuity, let him be judged guilty of hightreason.'

DETHRONED MONARCHS.

FORTUNE never appears in a more extravagant humour than when the reduces monarchs to become mendicants. This is no uncommon revolution in her eventful volumes. Modern history has recorded many such instances. After having contemplated Kings raised into Divinities, I shall present them now depressed as Beggars.

In Candide, or the Optimist, the reader will find an admirable stroke of Voltaire's. Eight travellers meet in an obscure inn, and some of them with not sufficient money to pay for a scurvy dinner. In the course of conversation, they are discovered to be eight monarchs, in Europe, who had been deprived of their crowns.

What adds to this exquisite satire, these eight monarchs are not of the sictitious majesties of the poetic brain; imperial shadows, like those that appeared to Macbeth; but living monarchs, who were wandering at that moment about the world.

Vol. I. Bb The

The Emperor Henry IV. after having been deposed and imprisoned by 'his son, Henry V. escaped from prison; poor, vagrant, and without aid, he entreated the Bishop of Spires to grant him a lay prebend in his Church. "I have studied said he, and have learned to sing, and may therefore be of some service to you."—The request was denied, and he died miserably and obscurely at Liege, after having drawn the attention of Europe on his victories and his grandeur. He exclaimed in dying, God of Vengeance, you avenge this parricide.

Mary of Medicis, the widow of Henry the Great, mother of Louis XIII. mother-in-law of three fovereigns, and Regent of France, frequently wanted the necessaries of life. The intrigues of Richelieu compelled her to exile herself, and live an unhappy fugitive. Her petition exists, with this supplicatory opening: 'Supplie Marie, Reine de France et de Navarre, disant, que depuis le 23 Fevrier elle aurait été arretée prisonniere au chateau de Compiegne, sans être ni accusée ni soupçonnée, &c.'

Theodore, King of Corsica, is not yet forgotten by many. Smollet, in his Ferdinard hand Count Fathom, has given us some curious anecdotes, which paint very forcibly the singular distresses of that monarch.

Others are to be added to this lift. In the year 1595, died at Paris, Antonio, King of Portugal. His body is interred at the Cordeliers, and his heart deposited at the Ave-Nothing on earth was capable of obliging this prince to renounce his crown. He passed over to England, and came to France, where he resided; and died, in great poverty, at the age of fixty-four years. This dethroned monarch was happy in one thing, which is indeed rare: in all his miferies he had a servant, who proved a tender and faithful friend, and who only defired to participate in his misfortunes, and to soften his miseries; and, for the recompence of his services, he only wished to be buried at the feet of his dear master. This hero in loyalty, to whom the ancient Romans would have raised altars, was Don Diego Bothei, one of the greatest lords of the court of Portugal, and who drew his origin from the kings of Bohemia.

Lilly, the astrologer, in his Life and Death of King Charles the First, presents us with another instance of an unfortunate monarch. It is in the person of the Old Queen Mother of France. These are his words—

'In the same month of August, 1641, I beheld the Old Queen Mother of France departing from London, in company of Thomas Earl of Arundel. A sad spectacle of mortality it was, and produced tears from mine eyes, and many other beholders, to see an aged, lean, decrepid, poor queen, ready for her grave, necessitated to depart hence, having no place of residence in this world left her, but where the courtesy of her hard fortune assigned it. She had been the only stately and magnificent woman of Europe: wife to the greatest king that ever lived in France; mother unto one king and unto two queens.'

Hume supplies me with an anecdote of singular royal distress. He informs us, that the Queen of England, with her son Charles, had 'a moderate pension assigned her; but it was so ill paid, and her credit ran so low, that, one morning, when the Cardinal de Retz waited on her, she informed him that her daughter, the princess princess Henrietta, was obliged to lie a-bed, for want of a fire to warm her. To such a condition was reduced, in the midst of Paris, a Queen of England, and daughter of Henry IV. of France!'

The daughter of James the First, who married the Elector Palatine, in her attempts to get her husband crowned, was reduced to the utmost beggary, and wandered frequently in disguise as a mere vagrant.

A strange anecdote is related of Charles VII. of France. Our Henry V. had shrunk his kingdom into the town of Bourges. It is said, that having told a shoemaker, after he had just tried a pair of his boots, that he had no money to pay for them, Crispin had such callous feelings, that he resused to suffer his majesty to take the boots. 'It is for this reason,' says Comines, 'I praise those princes who are on good terms with the lowest of their people; for they know not at what hour they may want them.'

This observation is not so mal a propos, at the present critical moment. Louis XVI. may have probably experienced more than once the truth of the resection of Commines.

FEUDAL TYRANNY,

THE Feudal government introduced a species of servitude which till that time was unknown, and which was called the Servitude of the Land. The Bondmen, or Villains, did not reside in the house of the Lord; but they entirely depended on his caprice; and he sold them, as he did the animals, with the sield where they lived, and which they cultivated.

It is difficult to conceive with what infolence the petty lords of those times tyrannized over their Villains; they not only oppressed their slaves with unremitted labour, instigated by a vile cupidity; but their whim and caprice led them to inslict miseries without even any motive of interest.

In Scotland, they had a right to enjoy the first-fruits of all the Maidens; and Malcolm the Third did not abolish this shame-ful right, but by ordering that they might be redeemed by a quit-rent.

The

The truth of this circumstance Dalrymple has attempted to render doubtful; but it must be also considered, that this historian is an ingenious Scotchman, It is a very excusable patriotism to endeavour to do away the recollection of such dishonourable tributes. The anecdote of the Lady of Coventry, is supposed by some, for it's singular barbarity, to be sistince; but, can there be any action too barbarous for such an age?

Others, to preserve this privilege when they could not enjoy it in all it's extent, thrust their leg, booted, into the bed of the new-married couple. Others have compelled their subjects to pass the first night at the top of a tree, and there to consummate the marriage; to pass the bridal hours in a river; to be bound naked to a cart, and to trace some surrows as they were dragged; or to leap, with their feet tied, over the horns of stags.

Sometimes their caprice commanded the bridegroom to appear in drawers at their castle, and plunge into a ditch of mud; and sometimes they were compelled to beat the Bb4 waters waters of the ponds, to hinder the frogs from disturbing the Lord!

There was a time when the German Lords reckoned, amongst their privileges, that of robbing on the highways of their territory!

I beg leave to remind the reader of the shameful behaviour of Geoffrey, Lord of Coventry, who compelled his wife to ride naked, on a white pad, through the streets of the town; that by this mode, he might restore to the inhabitants those privileges of which his wantonness had deprived them.

When the Abbot of Figeac makes his entry into that town, the Lord of Montbrun, dressed in a Harlequin's coat, and one of his legs naked, is compelled, by an ancient custom, to conduct him to the door of his abbey, leading his horse by the bridle.

The Feudal Barons frequently affociated, to share amongst them those children of their Villains who appeared to be the most healthy and serviceable, or who were remarkable for their talents; and, not infrequently, sold them in their markets as they did their beasts.

The Feudal servitude is not, even in the present enlightened times, entirely abolished in Poland, in Germany, and in Russia. In those countries, the Bondmen are still entirely dependent on the caprice of their masters. The Peasants of Hungary, or Bohemia, frequently revolt, and attempt to shake off the pressure of Feudal tyranny; and it is ardently to be wished that their wretched servitude should in some measure be softened.

It is scarce thirty years past, when a Lord or Prince of the Northern Countries, passing through one of his villages, observed a little assembly of Peasants and their families amusing themselves with dancing. He commands his domestics to part the men from the women, and confine them in the houses. He orders that the coats of the women may be drawn up above their heads, and tied with their garters. He then permits the men to be liberated, and inslicts a severe castigation on all those who did not recognize their wives in that state!

Absolute dominion hardens the human heart; and Nobles, accustomed to command their Bondmen, will treat their domestics mestics as slaves. Those of Siberia punish theirs by an abundant use of the cudgel or rod. The Abbé Chappe saw two Russian slaves undress a chambermaid, who had, by some trisling negligence, given offence to her mistress: after having uncovered as far as her waist, one placed her head betwixt his knees; the other held her by the seet: while both, armed with two sharp rods, violently lashed her back, till it pleased the tyrant of the house to decree it was enough?

After a perusal of these anecdotes of Feudal Tyranny, I shall take leave to transcribe the following lines from Goldsmith—

Except when fast-approaching danger warms:
But, when contending Chiefs blockade the Throne, Contracting Regal power, to stretch their own;
When I behold a factious Band agree
To call it Freedom, when themselves are free;
Fear, Pity, Justice, Indignation, start,
Tear off reserve, and bare my swelling heart;
Till half a Patriot, half a Coward, grown,
I sty from Petty Tyrants—to the Throne.

GAMING.

GAMING appears to be an universal passion. Some have attempted to deny it's universality; they have imagined that it is chiefly prevalent in cold climates, where such a passion becomes most capable of agitating and gratifying the torpid minds of their inhabitants.

But, if we lay afide speculation, and turn to facts, we are surely warranted in the supposition that, as the love of Gaming proceeds from avarice—that dishonourable passion, which, probably, for some wise purposes, is so congenial to the human heart—it is not unjust to conclude, that it exists with equal force in human nature; and, consequently, the fatal propensity of Gaming is to be discovered, as well amongst the inhabitants of the frigid and torrid zones, as amongst those of the milder climates. The savage and the civilized, the illiterate and the learned, are alike captivated ted with the hope of accumulating wealth without the labours of industry.

Mr. Moore has lately given to the public an elaborate work, which professedly treats of the three most important topics which a writer of the present day can discuss—Suicide, Gaming, and Duelling. He has collected a variety of instances of this destructive passion being prevalent in all nations; and I shall just notice those which appear most singular.

Dice, and that little pugnacious animal the Cock, are the chief instruments employed by the numerous nations of the East, to agitate their minds and ruin their fortunes; to which the Chinese—who are desperate gamesters—add the use of Cards. When all other property is played away, the Asiatic gambler scruples not to stake his wife, or his child, on the cast of a die, or courage and strength of a martial bird. If still unsuccessful, the last venture he stakes is, bim-self!

In the Island of Ceylon, cock-fighting is carried to a great height. The Sumatrans are addicted to the use of dice. A strong spirit fpirit of play characterizes a Malayan. After having refigned every thing to the good fortune of the winner, he is reduced to a horrid state of desperation; he then loosens a certain lock of hair, which indicates war and destruction to all the raving gamester meets. He intoxicates himself with opium; and, working himself up into a fit of phrenzy, he bites and kills every one who comes in his way. But, as soon as ever this lock is seen flowing, it is lawful to fire at the person, and to destroy him as fast as possible. I think it is this which our sailors call, 'To run a muck.' Thus Dryden writes—Frontless, and satire-proof, he scours the streets, And runs an Indian Muck at all he meets.

Thus also Pope—

Satire's my weapon, but I'm too discreet To run a Muck, and tilt at all I meet.'

Johnson could not discover the derivation of the word Muck. I think I have heard that it refers to their employing, on these fatal occasions, a muck, or lance.

A critical friend observes, that to 'run a muck' is not a substantive and another word for lance, but an old phrase for attacking madly and indiscriminately. It's origin remains yet to be known.

To discharge their gambling debts, the Siamese sell their possessions, their families, and, at length, themselves. The Chinese play night and day, till they have lost all they are worth; and then they usually go and hang themselves. Such is the propensity of the Japanese for high play, that they were compelled to make a law, that-Whoever ventures his money at play, shall be put to death.' In the newly-discovered islands of the Pacific Ocean, they venture even their hatchets, which they hold as invaluable acquisitions, on running matches! ' We saw a man,' as Cooke writes in his last voyage, ' beating his breast, and tearing his hair, in the violence of rage, for having lost three hatchets at one of these races, and which he had purchased with nearly half his property.'

The ancient nations were not less addicted to gaming. In the same volume are collected numerous instances amongst the ancient Persians, Grecians, and Romans; the Goths, the Germans, &c. To notice the modern modern ones were a melancholy talk: there is hardly a family in Europe who cannot record, from their own domestic annals, the dreadful prevalence of this unfortunate passion. Affection has felt the keenest lacerations, and Genius been irrecoverably lost, by a wanton sport, which doomed to destruction the hopes of families, and consumed the heart of the gamester with corrosive agony.

Gamester and Cheater were synonymous terms in the time of Shakespeare and Jon-Ion: they have hardly lost much of their double signification in the present day.

THE ATHENIANS.

MARVILLE has given this pleasing account of the Athenians—

'The Greeks were so polished a nation, that they treated others as rude and barbarous; but, of all the Greeks, the Athenians possessed a more refined delicacy in the politic arts, and an exquisite taste for eloquence. The excellent orators who arose amongst amongst them had familiarized them with the most perfect beauties of composition.

Pericles, whose eloquence they compared to lightnings and thunders, had so accustomed their minds to suffer nothing but what was pure, elegant, and finished, that those who had to speak in public, looked upon the lowest of the people as so many censurers of what they were going to say. But, if the genius of this people had become so delicate by the attic eloquence of their orators, the native haughtiness of the Greeks was much increased by their servile adulation; so that it required a wonderful dexterity to stretch the empire of Persusion over men who always would be treated like masters.

'The establishment of the singular law of Ostracism, which was occasioned by the tyranny of Pisistratus, caused a double increase of pride to this people, who were already so presumptuous. Thus runs the sentence of this samous law—" Let no one of us excel the others; and, if there should be one found of this description, let him go and excel elsewhere." By this law, those whose great merit and high reputation gave umbrage brage to their citizens, were banished for ten years.

'It was, in it's commencement, observed with so much rigour, that Aristides, who was furnamed The Just, and who had performed so many great actions for the glory of his country, was condemned to banishment: and, although this severity had greatly abated of it's rigour under Alcibiades, and that it was abolished in the course of time; there remained, in the manners and minds of the Athenians, a great jealousy of those who had distinguished themselves by some extraordinary merit; and a rigorous severity towards their orators, which constrained them to be very circumspect. The rules they had imposed on them went so far as to prohibit their displaying ornaments too elaborate, which might disguise their real sentiments—images and motions, capable of affecting and softening their auditorsfor they regarded the first as false lights, that might mislead their reason; and the latter, as attempts to encroach on their liberty, by swaying their passions. It is to this we must attribute that coldness and austerity which pervade the discourses of these Vol. I. Cc orators, and which rather proceeded from the restraint laid on them than from the qualities of their genius.

- Besides that the Athenians were haughty, jealous of their power, and austere towards their orators, they had an impatience, and a volatility of disposition, which occasioned them frequently to pass from one extreme to another, by sudden and unexpected resolutions, and often broke all the measures and schemes of those who attempted to gain them over to their sentiments.
- A hand raised, or a loud cry from some factious person, in an assembly, was often the signal for an advice that was to be disclosed, or of a counsel which was to be taken: and as it happens, that those who are the most insolent when they command, are the most supple when they obey; the Athenians, who had been so haughty during the prosperity of their republic, were the most abject slaves to the successors of Alexander; and afterwards to the Romans, when they became their masters. This feeble people had, in the bottom of their hearts, 2 fund of meanness and timidity, which made them constrain their orators to conform themselves themselves to their manners and their genius. To succeed with them, it became necessary to appear to respect them, whilst they taught them to fear; to flatter and to censure them at the same time—a policy which Demosthenes, who well knew this people, with great success so skilfully applied.

This people has, however, produced great men, and in great numbers; but they had so seldom a share in the public resolutions, that their merit, of which they have lest so many illustrious testimonies, cannot, however, make a general rule to judge of the character of this people.

To this ingenious discrimination of the character of the Athenians, I cannot forbear transcribing an animated description of their luxuries, carried to such an excess of refinement, and opulent elegance, that those who are fond of censuring our modern dissipations, may be reminded, that we have never yet approached those of the Grecians or the Romans. It is extracted from Dr. Gillies's History of Greece.

Instead of the bread, herbs, and simple fare, recommended by the laws of Solon,  $C \in 2$  the the Athenians, soon after the 80th Olyntpiad, availed themselves of their extensive commerce, to import the delicacies of diftant countries, which were prepared by all the refinements of cookery. The wines of Cyprus were cooled with fnow in fummer; in winter, the most delightful flowers adorned the tables and persons of the wealthy Athenians. Nor was it sufficient to be crowned with roses, unless they were likewife anointed with the most precious perfumes. Parasites, dancers, and buffoons, were an usual appendage of every entertainment. Among the weaker sex, the passion for delicate birds, distinguished by their voice or plumage, was carried to such an excess, as merited the name of madness. The bodies of such youths as were not addicted to hunting and horses, which began to be a prevailing taste, were corrupted by a commerce of harlots, who had reduced their profession into system, while their minds were still more polluted by the licentious philosophy of the Sophists. It is unnecessary to crowd the picture; vices and extravagance took root in Athens in an administration the most splendid and prosperous.

Perhaps

Perhaps this last observation is cleared up by the remarks of Marville; for it appears that, although at the helm of administration sat such illustrious characters, they had little or no share in the administration, since the haughtiness and volatility of the Athenians were such, that they would not even bear the reprimands of their Orators.

It has been observed, that even the Mechanics in Athens possessed a classic taste, and a niceness of ear, which could only be the effect of a general disfusion of national elegance. This may serve as an anecdote of their boasted Atticism.

Philip of Macedon, in the present age, would have merited the title of a Classical Scholar. I have already given the noble letter he wrote to Aristotle on the birth of his son. The present anecdote will prove, that he must have been—like the late Frederic—not less partial to the contemplative Minerva, than to the armed Pallas. To give a proof of his generolity, he made a present to the vanquished Athenians of five thousand measures of wheat; but this was not to be given by him without accompanying it by an oration. While he was Cc3 holding holding his discourse to the people, he committed a solecism in language, which the attic ear of an Athenian immediately catching, he boldly reproved him. 'For this,' the Classic Monarch continued, 'I grant you five thousand more.'

THE ITALIANS.

THE character of the Italians, even so late as in the last century, presents a melancholy contemplation to the Philosopher, How are we to account for a whole nation being infected with some of the darkest passions that stain the human soul? Atheism and Debauchery pervaded every rank; and the hand of the Italian continually grasped the dagger and the drug. What yet heightens the enormity of these crimes, is the 'immortal hatred'—to make use of a poetical expression—which characterized this Nation of Assassins. Naudé, who draws his remarks from personal observation, with one or two anecdotes, will inform the reader that these censures are not unjust.

Italy is crowded with those kinds of men who penetrate as far into Nature as their abilities permit them; and, having done this, will believe nothing more. To trace God, in the disorder in which the world is now, we must possess modesty and humi-Italy abounds with Libertines and Atheists; yet the number of their writers, who have written on the Immortality of the Soul, is incredible. But I am apt to think that those very writers believe no more than the rest: for I hold this maxim certain, that the doubt in which they are is one of the first causes that obliges them to write; and add, also, that all their writings are so feeble, that no one can strengthen his faith by their sentiments. Thus, instead of instructing, they make a reader perfectly sceptical.

Italy is a country, at the same time, sull of Impostures and Superstitions: some do not believe enough, and others believe every hing. Every day, without truth, and without reason, miracles take place. I renember that a certain poor man was nearly drowned, and was drawn out of the waer almost dead. He recovered; and his Cc4 recovery recovery was firmly believed to be owing to a medal of Saint Philip of Neri, which he happened to have in his chaplet. I did not fee any thing miraculous in this, I said; and that it certainly was not always a miracle when a manescaped from being drowned; nor did I believe that Saint Philip thought one moment concerning the sate of this man.

'It is but three months fince, that the church of this new saint sell in at Trepani, when more than a dozen of the congregation, who were invoking his favours, got wounded and killed. It was then, rather, that the saint should have shewn his miraculous powers, and have saved those good Christians who were supplicating God and his saintship. Had this been the case, it would have turned out an excellent miracle, and, what sew miracles are accompanied by, have had a considerable number of witnesses to verify it.

The Italians are an agreeable people enough; but, too frequently, they are found vindictive and treacherous. Revenge and treachery are the great sins of the Italians of this country, however it may be inimical to the laws of Christianity, that it is best to defend and to avenge ourselves before worse happens. As they have great sense, they will never offend you; but they will never pardon you, if you offend them; and they will pursue their revenge, after an interval of fifty years has elapsed since the offence had been sirst given. They have this proverb much in esteem—' Chi offende, non perdona mai.'

Descartes, in one of his Letters, writes thus—' Be not so desirous to live under Italian skies; there is a contagion that poisons it's breezes; the heat of the day kindles a fever in the delicate frame; the evening airs are unwholesome; and the deep shades of the night conceal robberies and assassinations!'

The following anecdotes of Italian revenge are of good authority. An Italian feigned to be reconciled with one who had offended him. One evening, when they walked out together in a retired spot, the Italian

Italian seized him by the back; and, drawing a dagger, threatened to stab him, if he did not abjure and curse the Creator. The other, in vain, entreated that he might not be obliged to commit what he selt a horror in doing; but, to save his life, at length he complied. The assassin, having now compleated his wish, plunged the poignard in his bosom; and exulting exclaimed, that he had revenged himself in the most dreadful manner possible; for he had caused the body and the soul of his enemy to perish at a single stroke!

One Giuseppe Bertoldo, after an absence of ten years, heard that a person, who had served him an ill turn, resided in flourishing circumstances in India: he embarks directly; he arrives; he follows him closely for two years; and, at length, having found him one day alone, and unarmed, in a solitary spot, he assassinates him.

There is a narration, written in Italian, in a manuscript in the French king's library, tacked to the end of a volume intitled—Le glorie degl' incogniti di Padoua.' It displays a chain of treachery dishonourable to the human character. It is translated in the the Addenda to the Anecdotes of Mr. Andrews. In Addison's Travels, there is an account of an affassination in Italy, not less remarkable than those we have noticed. I shall add an instance of poisoning, which cannot fail to interest the reader of sensibility.

Francis of Medicis, after the death of his lady, fell deeply in love with a young noble Venetian, named Bianca Capella, whom he married. This lady, who passionately loved the duke her husband, was the cause of his death; attempting to revenge herself à ? Italienne—as my author expresses it—of a prince who was a relation of Francis. She had, with this design, poisoned some olives that were to have been presented to him. Francis, having met the servant, took two, and eat them: very shortly after he began to feel their mortal effects. Bianca Capella, who now saw the mistake that had taken place, and the qui pro quo that had caused the death of her beloved duke, took also of the same olives; and, having swallowed them, she threw herself on the bed, em bracing her dying lord, and expired in his arms.

Voltaire,

Voltaire, in his Universal History, observes, that assalinations were common in Italy in the sixteenth century. He describes forcibly the great missortune of it's wanting a general police. He notices the banditti that for a long time insested it, in the midst of the polite arts. These are some of his words; 'The use of the stiletto was but too common in the towns, while the banditti insested the country. The scholars of Padua were accustomed to knock people down in the night, as they walked through the piazzas.'

I have quoted the opinion of Voltaire to strengthen my own; which, indeed, became very necessary, as it seems to differ from that of the ingenious Monthly Reviewer.

Since the above has been written, an Italian, a man of letters, has acknowledged, that the representation which I have given of this polite nation is by no means exaggerated. He has even confessed, that this character can hardly be said to be unjust, if applied to them even so late as within belf a century.

SPANISH ETIQUETTE.

THE Etiquette—or Rules to be observed in the royal palaces—is necessary, writes Baron Bielsield, for keeping order at court. In Spain, it was carried to such lengths as to make martyrs of their Kings. Here is an instance; at which, in spite of the fatal consequences it produced, one cannot refrain from smiling—

Philip the Third being gravely feated—as Spaniards generally are—by a chimney where the fire-maker of the court had kindled fo great a quantity of wood that the Monarch was nearly suffocated with heat, his grandeur would not suffer him to rise from the chair; and the domestics could not presume to enter the apartment, because it was against the Etiquette. At length, the Marquis de Potat appeared, and the King ordered him to damp the fires: but be excused himself; alledging, that he was forbidden by the Etiquette to perform such a function, for which the Duke D'Ussedaought

The Duke was gone out; the fire burnt fiercer; and the King endured it, rather than derogate from his dignity. But his blood was heated to such a degree, that an erysipelas broke out in hishead the next day; which, being succeeded by a violent fever, carried him off in 1621, and in the twenty-sourch year of his age.

The palace was once on fire; a foldier, who knew the King's fifter was in her apartment, and must inevitably have been consumed in a few moments by the slames, at the risk of his life, rushed in, and brought her Highness safe out in his arms: but the Spanish Etiquette was here woefully broken into! The loyal soldier was brought to trial; and, as it was impossible to deny that he had entered her apartment, the judges condemned him to die! The Spanish Princess, however, condescended, in consideration of the circumstance, to pardon the soldier, and very benevolently saved his life!

When Charles the Second received the compliments of the Grandees, who kissed hands on occasion of his ascending the throne,

one in the excess of his zeal ventured to use the word Friend, in his compliments of condolance and selicitation. The grave young monarch, starting from him, and swelling with authority, exclaimed—Los Reyes no tienen sus Vasfallos per Amiges, sine per Servideres: kings have not their Vassals for Friends, but for Servants.—An elegant monarch lamented the hard fortune of Kings, that they could have no friend. Charles must have thought differently.

One more instance, not less extravagant than any of these. When Isabella, mother of Philip II. was ready to be delivered of him, she commanded that all the lights should be extinguished; that if the violence of her pain should occasion her face to change colour, no one might perceive it. And when the midwise said—Madam, cry out, that will give you ease—she answered in good Spanish—How dare you give me such advice? I would rather die than cry out.

After this, we may exclaim, with war English Satirist—

Spain gives us pride—which Spain to all the earth
May largely give, nor fear horfelf a dearth!

POPE SIXTUS THE FIFTH.

A SINGULAR revolution of fortune happened to Pope Sixtus the Fifth. He was originally a swine-herd. When he first came to Rome, he was constrained to beg alms. Having collected a little filver, he one day stood deliberating with himself, whether he should employ it in the purchase of a loaf, which the keenness of his appetite reminded him would prove a very agreeable acquifition; or, in a pair of shoes, which his ten toes terribly complained of wanting. In this conflict of irrefolution, his face betrayed the anxiety of his mind. A tradesman, who had for some time observed his embarrassment, asked him the occasion of it. He told him frankly the cause; but he did it in so facetious a manner, that the tradesman resolved to finish his perplexity by inviting him to a good dinner. When Sixtus became Pope, he did not forget to return the dinner to the benevolent tradefman.

To give an instance of his abilities as a politician. When he first aspired in his mind to the Popedom, while he was yet a Cardinal, he counterfeited illness and old age for fifteen years. During the Conclave, which was assembled to create a Pope, he continually leaned on his crutch; and very frequently interrupted the sage deliberations of the Conclave by a hollow cough, and violent spitting. This scheme took so well, that the Cardinals fell into the trap; and every one thinking that, by electing Sixtus, he might himself stand a chance of being in a short time elected, he was chosen unanimoully. Soon after the election was concluded, the new Pope performed a miracle: his legs became vigorous; his body, that had been before curbed, became firm and erect; his cough was dissipated; and he shewed, in a short time, of what he was capable.

What he had obtained by such singular artifice he maintained with as fingular haughtiness. Cardinal Este, for a written promise which Sixtus gave him, greatly assisted in making him Pope; but Sixtus did not always grant the Cardinal the many Tavours he was continually asking. Once, in Vol. I. Dd in a passion, he said—Padre santo, so vi o fatto Papa.—Holy Father! it was me who made you Pope. To which Sixtus replied—Lasciatemi dunque essere Papa.—Let me, then, be Pope. Such are generally the replies of those politicians, whose superior Machiavelism (if the expression be allowed) has turned to their own account the interested motives of inferior politicians.

VICAR OF BRAY.

THE reader has frequently heard this reverend son of the Church mentioned: probably his name may have outlived the recollection of his pious manœuvres: he was in his principles a Sixtus the Fifth.

The Vicar of Bray, in Berkshire, was a Papist under the reign of Henry the Eighth, and a Protestant under Edward the Sixth; he was a Papist again under Queen Mary, and at length became a Protestant in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. When this scandal to the gown was reproached for his versatility of religious creeds, he made and swer, fwer, 'I cannot help that: but, if I changed my religion, I am fure I kept true to my principle; which is, to live and die Vicar of Bray!'

THE BODY OF CÆSAR.

A SKILFUL orator sometimes employs persuasions more forcible than the figures. or slowers of rhetoric can yield. Here is an instance—

Marc Antony, haranguing the Roman people after the death of Cæsar, who had just been assassinated by the Senate, held out to the observation of the people the robe of this great man, all bloody, and pierced through in two-and-twenty places. This made so great an impression on the minds of those who were present, that it appeared, not that Cæsar bad been assassinated, but that the conspirators were then actually assassinating him.

. Scudery has a fine verse on this subject—

C'est le sang de Cesar, Romains, qui parle a vous. Ye Romans, mark! 'tis Cessar's blood that speaks.

The

The sentiments of Anthony, King of Navarre, father to Henry IV. of France, must have been similar, as appears by the following anecdote. The Duke of Guise had resolved to assail assail and the presence of Francis the Second. Anthony of Navarre, says Voltaire, had a fearless heart. He was informed of the conspiracy; which did not, however, hinder him from going to the chamber in which it was to have been estected. If they kill me (he told his considential friend) take my bloody shirt, bring it to my son, and my wise: they will read in my blood what they shall do to revenge me.

PATRIOTIC MALEVOLENCE.

of man, that I am at a loss whether to consider as proceeding from an excess of malevolence, or an excess of patriotism. This passion cannot suffer even that the Hero or Author of a rival nation should be found to merit praise, though an interval of a thousand years may have elapsed since their days!

Whole histories have been written in this style, where the historian has set out with a resolution of detracting from, or denying, the merits of a rival nation. To give an instance in modern times—

A French writer has wilfully misrepresent, ed the samous anecdote recorded of our Canute, and endeavoured to convey an idea that we have ever been a nation of haughty barbarians. It cannot be ignorance, but wilful misrepresentation. The anecdote was never related but in one manner, and which reslects great honour on our ancient monarch. The author attempts to prove, that the English nation have been overbearing from the remotest times; and this he instances by giving the anecdote of Canute in this senseless narration—

Canute, King of England, imitating his predecessors, who called themselves lords and sovereigns of the sea, resolved to take possession of this title solemnly, that, in suture times, it should not be contested. Persuaded that he could not render this act more authentic than by obliging the sea itself to come and pay him homage, as to it's sovereign, about the time of the tide, he saised his throne by the sea-side; and there, D d 3 appa-apparelled in his royal robes, he held this language to the sea, when it rolled towards him—" Know, that thou art subjected to me: the earth on which I sit is mine; and that, till now, none has ever dared to revolt from my will. I command thee, then, that thou remain where thou art, without daring to approach thy lord, and soil his robes!" Scarce had he concluded this speech, when a wave overturned his throne; and, having wetted him from head to foot, taught him in what manner he was to rely on the obedience of this element.

Who does not here immediately perceive, that, to throw out a fatirical stroke on the English nation for their naval power, the author has wilfully disguised this famous reproof of Canute to his courtiers, and endeavoured to turn into ridicule the pride and the boast of the British nation?

It is thus, also, that the Spanish Literatic have spread an uncandid report concerning the Gil Blas of Le Sage. Despairing of producing a composition of similar merit, yet seeming desirous of the honour, they have taken advantage of his Spanish characters and his mode of narration, and they have ventured ventured to say, that, that celebrated work is a translation from the Spanish. They have contrived this absurd information in the following manner: the Spanish author having interspersed a variety of political passages throughout the original, which were highly offensive to the government, it remained, for this reason, unpublished. When Le Sage was secretary to the French ambassador, he, who knew the value of the work, rescinded the offending parts, and formed from the remains that agreeable romance. Similar reports prevail against every eminent person, in common life; but that they should so frequently occur in the republic of letters, can only be attributed to that dishonest patriotism which would level every merit of a gival nation,

DOUGLAS,

IT may be recorded, as a species of Puritanic savageness and Gothic barbarism, that, no later than in the year 1757, a man of genius was persecuted because he had written a D d 4 Tragedy,

Tragedy, which tended by no means to hurt the morals; but, on the contrary, by awakening the sweetest piety, and the nobler passions, would rather elevate the soul, and purify the mind.

When Mr. Home, the author of the tragedy of Douglas, had it performed at Edinburgh; and, because some of the divines, his acquaintance, attended the representation, the clergy, with the monastic spirit of the darkest ages, published the present Paper, which I shall abridge for the contemplation of the reader, who may wonder to see such a composition written in the eighteenth century.

the Presbytery of Glasgow came to the following resolution. They having seen a printed Paper, intituled—" An Admonition and Exhortation of the reverend Presbytery of Edinburgh;" which, among other evils prevailing, observing the following melancholy, but notorious, sacts: that one, who is a Minister of the Church of Scotland, did himself write and compose a Stage-play, intituled—" The Tragedy of Douglas," and got it to be acted at the theatre of Edinburgh;

CRITICAL HISTORY OF FOVERTY.

Mr. Morin has formed a little History of Poverty, which I shall endeavour to abridge.

It is difficult precisely to fix on the epoch of Poverty, or to mark with accuracy the moment of it's birth. Chronologists are filent; and those who have formed genealogies of the Gods, have not noticed this Deity's, though she has been admitted as fuch in the Pagan heaven, and has had temples and altars on earth. The Fabulists have pleasingly narrated of her, that at the feast which Jupiter gave on the birth of Venus, the modestly stood at the gate of the palace, to gather the remains of the celeftial banquet; when she observed Plutus, the God of Riches, inebriated, not with wine, but with nectar, roll out of the heavenly residence; and, passing into the Olympian gardens, he threw himself on a vernal bank. She seized this opportunity to become familiar with the God. The frolicksome Deity honoured her with his caresses; and, from this amour sprung the God of Love, who resembles his father in jollity and mirth, and his mother in his nudity. This fabulous narration is taken from the divine Plato. Let us now turn to it's historic extraction.

Poverty, though of remote antiquity, did not exist from the earliest times. In the first Age, distinguished by the epithet of the Golden, it certainly was unknown. In the terrestrial Paradise it never entered. This Age, however, had but the duration of a slower: when it finished, Poverty began to appear. The ancestors of the human race, if they did not meet her sace to sace, knew her in a partial degree. She must have made a rapid progress at the time of Cain; for Josephus informs us, he scoured the country with a banditti. Proceeding from this obscure obscure period, it is certain she was firmly established in the Patriarchal age. It is then we hear of merchants, who publicly practifed the commerce of vending slaves, which indicates the utmost degree of Poverty. She is distinctly marked by Job: this holy man protests, that he had nothing to reproach himself with respecting the Poor, for he had affisted them in their necessities.

As we advance in the Scriptures, we observe the Legislators paid great attention to their relief. Moses, by his wise precautions, endeavoured to soften the rigours of this unhappy state. The division of lands, by tribes and families; the septennial jubilees; the regulation to bestow, at the harvest-time, a certain portion of all the fruits of the earth for those families who were in want; and the obligation of his moral law, to love one's neighbour as one's self; were so many mounds erected against the inundations of Poverty. It was thus that the Jews, under' their Aristocratic government, had few or no Mendicants.—Their Kings were unjust; and, rapaciously seizing on inheritances which were not their right, increased the numbers numbers of the Poor. From the reign of David there were oppressive governors, who devoured the people as their bread. It. was still worse under the foreign powers of Babylon, of Persia, and the Roman Emperors. Such were the extortions of their publicans, and the avarice of their governors, that the number of mendicants was dreadfully augmented; and it was probably for that reason that the opulent samilies consecrated a tenth part of their property for their succour, as appears in the time of the Evangelists, In the preceding ages, no more was given—as their casuists assure us —than the fortieth, or thirtieth part; a custom which this unfortunate nation, to the present hour, preserve, and look on it as an indispensable duty; so much so, that if there are no Poor of their nation where they refide, they send it to the most distant parts. The Jewish merchants always make this charity a regular charge in their transactions with each other; and, at the close of the year, render an account to the Poor of their nation.

By the example of Moses, the ancient legislators were taught to pay a similar attention tention to the Poor. Like him, they published laws respecting the division of lands; and many ordinances were made for the benesit of those whom sires, inundations, wars, or bad harvests, had reduced to want. Convinced that idleness more inevitably introduced poverty, than any other cause, they punished it rigorously: the Egyptians made it criminal; and no vagabonds or mendia cants were suffered, under any pretence whatever. Those who were convicted of sothfulness, and still refused to labour for the public, when labours were offered to them, were punished with death. It was the Egyptian talk-masters who observed that the Israelites were an idle nation, and obliged them to furnish bricks for the erection of those famous pyramids, which are the works of men who otherwise had remained vagabonds and mendicants.

The same spirit inspired Greece. Lycurgus would not have in his republic either poor or rich: they lived and laboured in common. As, in the present times, every samily has it's stores and cellars, so they had public ones, and distributed the provisions according to the ages and constitutions of the people. If the same regulation was not precisely observed by the Athenians, the Corinthians, and the other people of Greece, the same maxim existed in full force against idleness.

According to the laws of Draco, Solon, &c. a conviction of wilful poverty was punished with the loss of life. Plato, more gentle in his manners, would have them only banished. He calls them enemies of the state; and pronounces, as a maxim, that where there are great numbers of mendicants, satal revolutions will happen; for, as these people have nothing to lose, they seize and plan opportunities to disturb the public repose.

The ancient Romans, whose universal object was the public prosperity, were not indebted to Greece on this head. One of the principal occupations of their Censors was to keep a watch on the vagabonds. Those who were condemned as incorrigible sluggards were sent to the mines, or made to labour on the public edifices. The Romans of those times, unlike the present race, did not consider the far niente as a pleasing occupation: they were convinced, that their libera-liberalities were ill-placed in bestowing them on such men. The little republics of the Bees and the Ants were often held out as an example; and the last, particularly, where Virgil says, that they have elected overseers, who correct the sluggards—

Castigant que moras. VIRGIL

And, if we may trust the narratives of our travellers, the Beavers pursue this regulation more rigorously and exactly than even these industrious societies. But their rigour, although but animals, is not so barbarous as that of the ancient Germans; who, Facitus informs us, plunged the idlers and vagabonds in the thickest mire of their marshes, and left them to perish by a kind of death that resembled their inactive dispositions.

Yet, after all, it was not inhumanity that prompted the ancients thus severely to chastise idleness: they were induced to it by a strict equity; and it would be doing them injustice to suppose, that it was thus they treated those unfortunate Poor whose indigence was occasioned by infirmities, by age, or unforeseen calamities. They perhaps exceeded us in genuine humanity. family constantly affisted it's branches, to fave them from being reduced to beggary; which, to them, appeared worse than death. The magistrates protected those who were destitute of friends, or incapable of labour. When Ulysses was disguised as a mendicant, and presented himself to Eurymachus, this prince, observing him to be robust and healthy, offered to give him employment, or otherwise to leave him to his ill fortune. When the Roman Emperors, even in the reigns of Nero and Tiberius, bestowed their largesses, the distributors were ordered to except those from receiving a share whose bad conduct kept them in misery; for that it was better the lazy should die with hunger than be fed in idleness.

Whether the police of the ancients was more exact, or whether they were more attentive to practife the duties of humanity, or that flavery served as an efficacious corrective of idleness; it clearly appears how little was the misery, and how sew the numbers, of their Poor. This they did, too, without having recourse to hospitals.

At the establishment of Christianity, when the Apostles commanded a community of riches among their disciples, the miseries of the poor became alleviated in a greater degree. If they did not absolutely live together, as we have seen religious orders, yet the rich continually supplied their distressed brethren: but matters greatly changed under Constantine. This Prince, with the best intentions, published edicts in favour of those Christians who had been condemned, in the preceding reigns, to slavery, to the mines, the galleys, or prisons. The Church felt an inundation of prodigious crowds of these unhappy men, who brought with them urgent wants and corporeal infirmities. The Christian families formed then but a few: they could not satisfy these men. The magistrates protected them: they built spacious hospitals, under different titles, for the sick, the aged, the invalids, the widows, and orphans. The Emperors, and the most eminent personages, were seen in these hospitals, examining the patients. Sometimes they affished the helpless, and sometimes dressed the wounded. This did so much honour to the new religion, that Julian the Vol. I. E e Apostate Apostate introduced this custom among the Pagans. But the best things are seen continually perverted.

These retreats were found insufficient. Many slaves, proud of the liberty they had just recovered, looked on them as prisons; and, under various pretexts, wandered about the country. They displayed, with art, the scars of their former wounds, and exposed the imprinted marks of their chains. found thus a lucrative profession in begging, which had been interdicted by the laws. The profession did not finish with them: men of an untoward, turbulent, and licentious disposition, gladly embraced it. It spread so wide, that the succeeding Emperors were obliged to institute new laws; and it was permitted to individuals to seize on these mendicants for their saves and perpetual vassals: a powerful preservative against this disorder. It is observed in almost every part of the world but ours; and it is thus that no where else they so abound with beggars. China presents us with a noble example. No beggars are seen loitering in that country. All the world are occupied, even to the blind and the lame. Those who are pence. What is done there, may also be performed here. Then, instead of that hideone, importunate, idle, licentious poverty—as pernicious to the police as to morality—we should see the poverty of the earlier ages humble, modest, frugal, robust, industrious, and laborious. Then, indeed, the sable of Plato might be realized: Poverty may be embraced by the god of riches; and, if she did not produce the voluptuous offspring of Love, she would become the fertile mother of Agriculture, and the ingenious mother of the fine Arts, and of all kinds of Manusactures.

SLAVERY.

I HAVE chiefly collected the present Anecdotes from the ingenious Compiler of L'Esprit des Usages et des Coutumes.'

It avails little to exclaim against Slavery; it is an evil so natural to man, that it is impossible totally to eradicate it. Man will be a tyrant; and, if he possessed an adequate E e 2 strength, strength, he would enslave whatever surrounded him. Dominion is so flattering to pride, and to idleness, that it is impossible to sacrifice it's enjoyments. Even the Slave himself requires to be attended by another Slave: it is thus with the Negro of Labat; who, since his state permits of none, assumes a despotic authority over his wife and children.

There are Slaves even with savages,; and, if force cannot establish servitude, they employ other means to supply it. The Chief of the Natchès of Louisiana disposes at his will of the property of his subjects: they dare not even refuse him their head. He is a perfect despotic prince. When the presumptive heir is born, the people devote to him all the children at the breast, to serve him during his life. This petty Chief is a very Schostris; he is treated in his cabin as the Emperor of China is in his palace. Indeed, the origin of his power is great: the Natchès adore the Sun, and this Sovereign has palmed himself on them for the Brother of the Sun!

Servitude is sometimes as pleasing to the slave as it is gratifying to the master; and can any thing more strongly convince us, that the greater part of men are unworthy of tasting the sweets of liberty? It was thus, when the Monarchs of France were desirous of despoiling the Barons of the authority they had usurped, the bondmen, accustomed to slavery, were slow in claiming their liberty. To effect this, it became necessary to compel them by laws; and Louis Hutin ordered, that those villains, or bondmen, who would not be enfranchised, should pay heavy sines.

The origin of Slavery, in some countries, arises from singular circumstances. If a Tartar met in his way a man, or woman, who could not shew a passport from the King, he would seize on the person as his right and property.

Formerly, in Circassia, when the husband and wife did not agree, they went to complain to the governor of the town. If the husband was the first who arrived, the governor caused the woman to be seized and sold, and gave another to the husband, and, on the contrary, he seized and sold the husband, if the wife arrived first.

Liberality, and the desire of obliging— E e 3 who who could credit it?—occasion the depriving others of their liberty. An Islander of Mindanao, who redeems his son from Slavery, makes him his own slave; and children exercise the same benevolence and rigour on their parents.

In Rome, the debtor became the save of his creditor; and, when it happened that they could take nothing from him who had lost every thing, they took his liberty. It is even believed, that the law of the Twelve Tables permitted them to cut into pieces an insolvent debtor!

It is since the establishment of the commerce and sale of Negroes, that men have committed the most enormous crimes. The Mulattoes of Loanda seduce the young wemen wherever they pass; they return to them, some years afterwards; and, under the pretext of giving the children a better education, they carry them off to sell them.

Thus, also, the women of Benguela, in collusion with their husbands, allure other men to their arms. The husband falls suddenly of them, imprisons the unfortunate gallants, and sells them the first opportunity; and he is not punished for these violences.

Besides,

Besides, the Negroes sell their children, their parents, and their neighbours! They lead to the country-house of the merchant their unsuspectful victims, and there deligner them into the hands of their purchaser. While they are loaded with chains, and separated for ever from their most endearing connections, it is in vain they raise loud and melancholy cries: the infamous vender smiles, and says it is only a cunning trick. Le Maire informs us, that an old Negro resolved to sell his son; but the son, who suspected his design, hastened to the factor; and, having taken him aside, sold him his father!

The illanders of Billagos are passionately fond of spirituous liquors; and, on the arrival of a vessel, the weakest, without distinction of age, friendship, or relationship, become the prey of the strongest, that they may sell them to purchase liquors.

It appears that, in the East, and particularly at Batavia, the life of a slave entirely depends on the caprice of his master: the slightest fault brings on him the most afslicting treatment. They bind him to a gallows; they slog him unmercifully with E e 4 splitted splitted canes; his blood flows in a stream, and his body is covered with wounds: but, fearful that he may not die in sufficient tortures, they scatter abundantly over them salt and pepper. So little care is paid to these unfortunate men amongst the Maldivians, that they lie entirely at the mercy of every one. Those who practise on them any ill treatment, receive only half the punishment that the laws exact from any one who had ill-treated a free person. The slightest chastisement which is inslicted on them, at Java, is to carry about their necks a piece of wood, with a chain, and which they are condemned to drag all their lives.

The slaves of the kingdom of Angola, and many other countries of Africa, never address their masters but on their knees. They do not even allow them the honours of decent burial; they throw their bodies in the woods, where they become the food of wild beasts.

If those on the Gold Coast escape, and are retaken, they lose an ear for the first official of this kind: a second offence is punished with the loss of the other. At the third, it is allowed their masters either to sell fell them to the Europeans, or to cut offtheir heads.

Religious fanaticism increases the inhumanity of the pirates of Africa. The Moors and the Europeans reciprocally detest each other; and, since they redeem their captives, the Mahometans have become unmerciful, that they may the more powerfully excite their friends to redeem them with heavy ransoms. We must not credit every thing Historians record; but it is certain that the police does not punish the master who kills his slaves; that religious prejudices totally stifle the feelings of humanity; and that the zealous Mussulman inflicts continual tortures on these unfortunate men, that they may abjure their religion.

The Spaniards, and the Knights of Malta, for their reprifals, chain to the galley all the Mahometans they make prisoners; and, it is thus that the fate of the Christian slaves on the Northern Coast of Africa, is the natural consequence of a war which never can terminate.

When the Negroes of the Colonies folely depend on a brutal master, who can paint the horrors of their situation? Without out dwelling on the cruelties which they suffer in Africa, before they are sold, and during the voyage; the greater part believe, that, after their embarkation, the Europeans intend to massacre them in the most terrible manner imaginable; to burn, calcine, and pulverize their bones, to be employed as gampowder; and they also imagine, that the Europeans manufacture an oil with their fas and marrow.

If they do not finish their task, they are lashed with rods till they are covered with blood. Sometimes they pour over the raw wounds a pound of melted pitch; and sometimes they heighten their unsupportable smart, by scattering over them handfuls of pepper!

The habit of suffering endows them with an admirable patience. It is thus Labet expresses himself on this head. They are seldom heard to cry out, or to complain. It is not owing to insensibility, for their sless is extremely delicate, and their seelings irritable. It proceeds from an uncommon magnanimity of soul, which sets at designed pain, grief, and death itself. I have more than once seen some broken on the wheel, and and others tormented by the most dreadful machines inventive cruelty could produce, without their giving vent to one murmur, or shedding one tear. I saw a Negro burnt, who was so far from being affected, that he called for a little lighted tobacco, on his way to the place of execution; and I observa ed him smoke with great calmness, at the moment his feet were confuming in the midst of the flames. There were two New groes condemned; the one to the gallows, the other to be whipped by the hand of the executioner. The Priest, in a mistake, confessed him who was not to have died. They did not perceive it, till the moment the executioner was going to throw him off; they made him descend; the other was confessed; and, although he expected only to be whipped, he mounted the ladder with as much indifference as the first descended from it, and as if the choice of either fate was alike to him.'

How grievous must be the unfortunate destiny of those Negroes, when they possess a soul so great, and sentiments so sublime! Atkins, examining once some slaves, chaserved one of a noble stature, who appeared to him not less vigorous than imperious; he glanced on his companions, whenever they murmured or wept, looks of reproach and disdain. He never turned his eyes on the overseer; and, if commanded to rise, or to stretch his leg, he did not by any means immediately obey. His exasperated master wearied himself with lashing his naked body with his rod. He was going to dispatch him in his fury, had it not been observed to him, that if he fold him, he might get an uncommon price for a flave of his appearance. The Negro supported this persecution with heroic intrepidity; he preserved a rigid silence; a tear or two only trickled down his cheek; when, as if he blushed for his weakness, he turned aside to hide them. 'I learnt,' Atkins writes, 'that he was a Chief of some villages who had just come from opposing the slave traffick of the English.' Mr. Mackenzie, in one of his novels, has described this scene with the pen of a master; and certainly draws the picture after the description of Atkins.

Many European nations abandon the Negroes to the caprice of their masters, or to the despotic decision of the magistrate. The French French have drawn up some regulations, which have been called the Black Code. This article trespasses so much on our usual himits, that we cannot extract any for the contemplation of the reader; let it be sufficient, however, to observe, that they are eternal records of European cupidity, and European inhumanity.

In a word, they have reduced them to the degree of brutes, and they have treated them with infinitely more inhumanity. Whatever the arbitrary decrees of a planter—continues our ingenious compiler—may perform, they cannot take from them the human figure, nor the human voice: they feem, indeed, exasperated to find that they bear an affinity to their own species!

A NEW RELIGION.

All the world knows how successful some impostors have been in the establishment of religions. We Europeans are well persuaded, that the Jewish and the Christian are derived from Divine authority. We are perfectly satisfied that Mahomet, Mance Capac, Confucius, the Lama of Tartary, are impostors; though a greater number of nations respect their various holy scriptures more than the true Bible. As voyagers have made new discoveries, new religions have heen discovered. The list of religious impostors it were not difficult to augment. The Jews have seen five or six sictitious Messiahs-Sabbatei Sevi the most remarkable of them. I am convinced, that not a few religions have failed in their establishment; and I will oppose to these impostors a man, who was more learned and able than any of them. But circumstances were not favourable to his system: he had not, like Mahomet, to join with his Alcoran, a good armoury of swords in his possession.

About the middle of the fifteenth century, fome time before the Turks had become masters of Constantinople, a great number of philosophers slourished. Gemistus Pletbo was one distinguished by the excellence of his genius, by the depth of his erudition, and chiesly by his being a warm Platonist. Such were his eminent abilities, that, in his old age, those whom his novel system had greatly greatly irritated, either seared or respected him. He had scarcely breathed his last, when they began to abuse Plato and our Plethe. Here is an account, written by George of Trebizond—

There has lately arose amongst us a second Mahomet; and this second, if we do not take care, will exceed in greatness the first, by the dreadful consequences of his wicked doctrine, as the first has exceeded Plato. A disciple and rival of this philosopher, in philosophy, in eloquence, and in science, he had fixed his residence in the Peloponnese. His common name was Gemiftus, but he assumed that of Pletho. Perhaps Gemistus, to make us believe more early that he was descended from heaven, and to engage us, to receive more readily his doctrine and his new law, wished to change his name, according to the manner of the ancient patriarchs; of whom it is said, that at the time the name was changed they were called to the greatest things. He has written with wonderful art, and with great elegance. He has given new rules for the conduct of life, and for the regulation of human affairs; and, at the same time, has vomited forth a great great number of blasphemies against the Catholic religion. It is certain, he was so zealous a Platonist, that he entertained no other sentiments than those of Plato, concerning the nature of the Gods, Souls, Sacrifices, &c. I have heard him, myself, when we were together at Florence, say, that in a few years all men on the face of the earth would embrace, with one common consent, and with one mind, a single and simple religion, at the first instructions which should be given by a single preaching. And when I asked him, if it would be the religion of Jesus Christ, or that of Mahomet? he answered—"Neither one nor the other; but a third, which will not greatly differ from Paganism." These words I heard with so much indignation, that since that time I have always hated him: I look upon him as a dangerous viper; and I cannot think of him without abhorrence.'

The pious writer of this account is too violently agitated: he might, perhaps, have bestowed a smile of pity, or contempt; but the bigots of religion are not less insant than the impious themselves.

It was when Pletho died, that the malice of his enemies collected all it's venom. cannot but acknowledge from this circumstance, that his abilities must have been astonishingly vast, to have kept such crowds filent: and, it is not improbable, this scheme of impiety was less impious than the majority of the people imagined. Not a few Catholic writers lament that his book was burnt, and greatly regret the loss of Pletho's work; which, they say, was not meant to subvert the Christian religion, but only to unfold the system of Plato, and to collect what he and other philosophers had written on religion and politicks. At the same time, however, we must recollect the express words of Pletho, which we come from transcribing as given us by George of Trebizond.

Of his religious scheme, the reader may now judge, by this summary account. The general title of the volume ran thus—'This Book treats of the Laws, of the best Form of Government, and what all men must observe in their public and private stations, to live together in the most perfect, the most innocent, and the most happy manner.' The whole was divided into Three Books. Vol. I. F f

The titles of the chapters, where Paganism was openly inculcated, are reported by Gennadius, who condemned it to the flames, but who has not thought proper to enter into the manner of his arguments, &c. The impiety and the extravagance of this new legislator appeared, above all, in the articles which concerned Religion. He acknowledges a plurality of Gods: some superior, whom he placed above the heavens; and the others, inferior, on this side the heavens. The first, existing from the remotest antiquity; the others younger, and of different ages. He gave a king to all these gods; and he called him ZEYE—or Jupiter—as the Pagans named this power formerly. According to him, the Stars had a Soul; the Demons were not malignant Spirits; and the World was Eternal. He established Polygamy; and was even inclined to a community of women. All his work was filled with such follies; and with not a few impieties, which my pious author will not venture to give.

What the intentions of Pletho were, it would be rash and ungenerous in us to determine. If the work was only an arrangement ment of the Heathen notions, it was an innocent and curious volume. It is allowed, that he was uncommonly learned and humane, and had not passed his life entirely in the solitary recesses of his study.

I cannot quit this article without recollecting some similar works even of the present day! The ideas of the phrenetic Emanuel Swedenburgh are warmly cherished by a sect, who have so far disgraced themselves as to bestow on their society the name of this man.
Mr. T. Taylor, the Platonic philosopher, and the modern Pletho, consonant to that philosophy, professes Polytheisin.

A book published by a person known by the title of walking Stuart, is not less to be distinguished; and we have seen a Vanini in our days, if such a person as W. Hammond of Liverpool ever existed.

An eccentric genius frequently exclaim-ed—Oh, that I but knew the Oriental languages! I have the finest system of religion possible: it is superior to all others. It would perfectly suit the Orientalists. O that I but knew their language; I should grow opulent in a short time!

436 HISTORICAL ANECDOTES.

Houssaie records an anecdote of Aibzema an able politician, who was agent for the Hanseatic towns. But, with all his abilities, he was continually fluctuating in his religious opinions. In that critical time, each fect or religion was desirous of drawing him to their side; but none could succeed. When he was at the Hague, his landlady informed him, that there had been to enquire for him that day a number of ministers, Lutherans, Calvinists, Arminians, Arians, and Gomarists, who all expressed an eager with to converse with him. 'Madam,' he answered, 'I beg you would tell all these gentlemen, that it is very useless to come for the subject they do; because I am resolved to die incognito.'

HISTORIAN.

THE famous Le Clerc, great in his day as a journalist, observes, that there are sour principal things essential to constitute a good Historian; and, without which, nothing thing considerable from him can be expected. The first is, to be well instructed in what he undertakes to relate. The second, to be able, without any disguises, to say what he thinks to be the truth. The third is, to be capable of relating what he knows. The fourth, to be capable of judging of the events, and of those who occasion them. If we resect on the ability of the Historian in these four points, we may be enabled to judge if a History is well or ill written.

'HISTORY' (says Dr. King, at the conclusion of his keen Reflections on Varillas) is, indeed, a serious matter; not to be written carelessly, like a letter to a friend; nor with passion, like a billet to a mistress; nor with brass, like a declamation for a party at the bar, or the remonstrance of a minister for his prince; nor, in fine, by a man unacquainted with the world, like soliloquies and meditations. It requires a long experience, a sound judgment, a close attention, an unquestionable integrity, and a style without affectation.

History should never be dedicated to kings. Capriata, an esteemed Italian historian, dedicated his work not to princes, but to princes Ff 3 vate men; for he was fearful that an epifle dedicatory to a monarch, would have given reason to suppose that he had not written his history with all that moderation and truth which the historical art requires. It was very judicious; for the sincerity of an historian would have composed an aukward panegyric. Few dedicate to kings without the hope of some gratification. Bayle observes—C'est une Coutume de piper aux Souverains a qui l'on adresse un ouvrage. The historian should only dedicate his works to Posterity.

QUEEN ELIZABETH.

VIGNEUL Marville has written, in his lively and bold manner, what I must confess I think just, concerning our 'Virgin-Queen.'

Elizabeth, Queen of England, passionately admired handsome and well-made men; and he was already far advanced in her favour who approached her with beauty and with grace. On the contrary, she had so unconquerable an aversion for ugly and ill-made men, who had been treated unfortunately by Nature, that she could not endure their presence.

- 'When she issued from her palace, her guards were careful to disperse from before her eyes hideous and deformed people, the lame, the hunch-backed, &c. in a word, all those whose appearance might shock her delicate sensations.
- 'There is this singular and admirable in the conduct of Elizabeth, that she made her pleasures subservient to her politics, and she maintained her affairs by what in general occasions the ruin of princes. So secret were her amours, that, even to the present day, their mysteries cannot be penetrated; but the utility she drew from them is public, and always operated for the good of her people. Her lovers were her ministers, and her ministers were her lovers. Love commanded, Love was obeyed; and the reign of this princess was happy, because it was a reign of Love, in which it's chains and it's slavery are liked!'

The origin of Raleigh's advancement in the queen's graces, was by an action of gal-F f 4 lantry, lantry, which perfectly gratified her majesty, not insensible to flattery. He sound the queen taking a walk; and a wet place incommoding her royal sootsteps, Raleigh immediately spread his new plush cloak across the miry place. The queen stepped cautiously on it, and passed over dry; but not without a particular observation of him who had given her so eloquent, though silent a flattery. Shortly afterwards, from Captain Raleigh, he became Sir Walter, and rapidly advanced in the queen's favour.

There is little doubt that Elizabeth felt the amorous passion in an extreme degree; particularly for her favourite the Earl of Essex. Every reader does not know that that passion could not be gratified: there were physical reasons against it; ber amours would bave cost her, ber life. So well was she persuaded of this, that, one day when she was warmly pressed to marry the Duke of Alençon, who courted her with ardour, she answered, that she did not consider herself as so little loved by her subjects, that they were desirous of burying her before her time.

Hume

Hume has furnished us with ample proofs of the passion which her courtiers seigned for her, and which, with others I shall give, confirm the opinion of Vigneul Marville, who did not know, probably, the reason why her amours were never discovered; which, indeed, never went further than mere gallantry. Hume has preserved, in his notes, a letter written by Raleigh. It is a perfect amorous composition. After having exerted his poetic talent to exalt ber charms, and his affection, he concludes, by comparing her majesty, who was then saxty, to Venus and Diana. Sir Walter was not her only courtier who wrote in this style.

Those who are intimately acquainted with the private anecdotes of those times, know what encouragement this royal coquette gave to most who were near her person. Dodd, in his Church History, says, that the Earls of Arran and Arundel, and Sir William Pickering, 'were not out of hopes of gaining Queen Elizabeth's affections in a matrimonial way.'

She encouraged every person of eminence: she even went so far, on the anniversary of her coronation, as publicly to take take a ring from her finger, and put it on the Duke of Alençon's hand. She also ranked amongst her suitors, Henry the Third of France, and Henry the Great. There was also a taylor who died for love of her majesty.

When Buzenval ridiculed her bad pronunciation of the Frenchlanguage, she never forgave him. And when Henry IV. sent him over to her on an embassy, she would not receive him. So nice was the irritable pride of this great Queen, that she made her private injuries matters of state.

This Queen,' (writes Du Maurier, in his Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire de Hollande) who displayed so many heroic accomplishments, had this soible—of wishing to be thought beautiful by all the world. I heard from my father, that, having been sent to her, at every audience he had with her majesty, she pulled off her gloves more than a hundred times, to display her hands, which indeed were very beautiful and very white.'

Houssaie, in his Memoires Historiques, &c. vol. I. p. 74, has given the following anecdote of Elizabeth, which I give in his own words, but do not venture to translate

fo scandalous, though so gallant, an inter-

'Un jour, Nicolas de Harlay, étant à l'audience de la reine d'Angleterre Elisabeth, lui coula quelque mot de mariage avec le roi son maitre. Il ne faut pas songer a cela, repondit-elle; mon Gendarme (c'est le nom de guerre qu'elle donnoit à Henri IV.) n'est pas mon fait, ni moi le sien: non pas que je ne sois encore en état de donner du plaisir à un mari qui me conviendroit, mais pour d'autres raisons. Là-dessus levant ses jupes et le bas de sa chemise, elle lui montra sa cuisse. Harlay mit un genou à terre, et la lui baisa. Elisabeth s'en facha, ou fit semblant de s'en facher, comme d'un manquement de respect. Madame dit-il, pardonnez-moi ce que je viens de faire: c'est ce qu'auroit fait mon Maitre, s'il en avoit vu autant. Cette excuse plut à la reine qui se connoissoit fort en galanterie, et Henri IV. en loua Harlay.'

I have yet another anecdote, not less curious. It is relative to the affair of the Duke of Anjou and our Elizabeth. It is another proof of her partiality for handsome men.

The

The writer was Lewis Guyon, a contemporary of the times he notices.

'Francis Duke of Anjou being desirous of marrying a crowned head, caused proposals of marriage to be made to Elizabeth Queen of England. Letters passed betwixt them, and their portraits were exchanged. At length her majesty informed him, that she would never contract a marriage with any one who fought her, if she did not first see bis person. If he would not come, nothing more should be said on the subject. This prince, over-pressed by his young friends, (who were as little able of judging as himself) paid no attention to the counsels of men of maturer judgment. He passed over to England without a splendid train. The faid lady contemplated his person: she found him ugly, disfigured by deep scars of the small-pox, and that he also had an ill-shaped nose, with swellings in the neck! All these were so many reasons with her, that he could never be admitted into her good graces.'

Queen Elizabeth was taught to write by the celebrated Roger Ascham. Her writing is extremely beautiful and correct, as may be seen by examining a little manuscript book of prayers, preserved in the British Museum.

CROMWELL.

In the Funeral Oration of Henrietta, Queen of England, the character of Cromwell 'is delineated by a pencil of which the strokes are firm, though delicate—

A man was seen with a profundity of mind that exceeds our belief. As sinished a Hypocrite as he was a skilful Politician; capable of undertaking any thing, and of concealing what he undertook; equally indefatigable and active in peace as in war; who left nothing to Fortune which he could seize from her by foresight and prudence; but, for what remained, always so vigilant and so ready, that he never failed to improve the occasions she presented him. In a word, he was one of those daring and adventurous minds which seem born to change the affairs of the world.

446 HISTORICAL ANECDOTES.

The ambassador from the French Court in that day was an able Minister; and that he was, at the same time, a fine Writer, the following sketch of Cromwell evinces. It has the advantage of being given by one who was a witness to what he observes—

'He was gentle and cruel when either was necessary for his interests. He had no faith in religion, no honour in his professions, no fidelity to his friends, than as the semblance of these virtues served towards his aggrandizement. He knew better than any man to put into practice all the pious grimaces and infinuating manners of the false votarists of religion; and to conceal, under an humble air and popular address, an unmeasurable ambition. In a word, he possessed, in the supreme degree, all the qualities of a great Politician; and there was nothing wanting' to compleat his good fortune, but to have acquired his success by better means, to have lived longer, and to have had children worthy of succeeding him.'

EDWARD THE FOURTH.

OUR Edward the Fourth was a gay and voluptuous Prince; and, what is fingular, he probably owed his crown to his enormous debts, and passion for the fair sex. had not one Jane Shore, but many. honest Philip de Comines, his contemporary. He fays, that what greatly contributed to : his entering London as soon as he appeared at it's gates, was the great debts this Prince had contracted, which made his creditors gladly affift him; and the high favour in which he was held by the Bourgeoises, into whose good graces he had frequently glided, and who gained over to him their husbandswho, I suppose, for the tranquillity of their lives, were glad to depose or raise monarchs.

These are De Comines's words—' Many ladies, and rich citizens wives, of whom formerly he had great privacies and familiar acquaintance, gained over to him their husbands and relations.'

This .

This is the description of his voluptuous life; we must recollect, that the writer had been an eye-witness, and was an honest man; while modern Historians only view objects through the coloured medium of their imagination, and do not always merit the latter appellation.

' He had been, during the last twelve years, more accustomed to his ease and pleafures than any other Prince who lived in his time. He had nothing in his thoughts but les dames, and of them more than was reasonable; and hunting-matches, good eating, and great care of his person. When he went, in their seasons, to these huntingmatches, he always caused to be carried with him great pavilions for les dames; and, at the same time, gave splendid entertainments; so that it is not surprizing that his person was as jolly as any one I ever saw. He was then young, and as handsome as any man of his age; but he has fince become enormoully fat.'

Since I have got old Philip in my hand, the reader will not, perhaps, be displeased, if he attends to a little more of his naiveté, which will appear in the form of a conversa-zione of the times. He now relates what passed between Edward and the King of France—

When the ceremony of the oath was concluded, our king, who was defirous of being friendly, began to say to the King of England, in a laughing way, that he must come to Paris, and be jovial amongst our ladies; and that he would give him the Cardinal de Bourbon for his confessor, who would very willingly absolve him of any fin which perchance he might commit. The King of England seemed well pleased at the invitation, and laughed heartily; for he knew that the said cardinal was un fort bon compagnon. When the king was returning, he spoke on the road to me; and said, that he did not like to find the King of England so much inclined to come to Paris. is," said he, " a very handsome king: he likes the women too much. He may probably find one at Paris that may make him like to come too often, or stay too long. His predecessors have already been too much at Paris and in Normandy;" and that his company was not agreeable this side of Vol. I. Gg the sea; but that, beyond the sea, he wished to be ben frere et any.'

I feel an inclination to give another conversation-piece; but, lest the reader should not so keenly relish the honest old narrator as myself, it may be necessary to restrain my pen.

A RELIC.

HENRY the Third was deeply tainted with the vilest superstition. He was a prince of a dastardly disposition; and, like all bigots, endeavoured, by mean subterfuge and low cunning, to circumvent others: incapable of that noble frankness which characterizes an honest man not bigotted to the senseless rites of superstition. As an instance of his bigotry, take this account of a Relic, which is too curious to abridge—

'Henry summoned all the great men of the kingdom, A.D. 1247, to come to London on the festival of Saint Edward, to receive an account of a certain sacred benefit which which Heaven had lately bestowed on England. The fingular strain of this summons excited the most eager curiosity, and brought great multitudes to London at the time appointed. When they were all assembled in Saint Paul's Church, the King acquainted them, that the Great Master of the Knights Templars had sent him, by one of his Knights, a phial of crystal, containing a small portion of the precious blood of Christ, which he had shed upon the Cross for the salvation of the world, attested to be genuine by the seals of the Patriarch of Jerusalem, of several Archbishops, Bishops, and Abbots. This, he informed them, he designed to carry, the next day, in solemn procession, to Westminster, attended by them, and by all the Clergy of London, in their proper habits, with their banners, crucifixes, and wax-candles; and exhorted all who were present to prepare themselves for that sacred solemnity, by spending the night in watching, fasting, and devout exercises.

On the morrow, when the procession was put in order, the King approached the sacred phial with reverence, fear, and trembling; took it in both his hands; and, holding it up higher than his face, proceeded under a canopy, two affistants supporting his arms. Such was the devotion of Henry on this occasion, that, though the road between Saint Paul's and Westminster was very deep and miry, he kept his eyes constantly fixed on the phial, or on heaven. When the procession approached Westminster, it was met by two Monks of that Abbey, who conducted it into the church, where the King deposited the venerable Relic; which, says the Historian, made all England shine with glory, dedicating it to God and Saint Edward.

CHARLES THE FIRST.

A FRENCH writer has recorded an anecdote of this unfortunate prince, which characterizes the classical turn of his mind, and the placability of his disposition.

A Frenchman, who had formed a tender connection with the wife of one of the principal enemies of Charles—who was then put under arrest, but very carelessly guarded —having —having learnt from this lady, that they had resolved to make the king perish on a scaffold, communicated the intelligence to Mr. De Bellicore, the French ambassador, who immediately ran to the king, to give him the important notice. Bellicore was kept in waiting for a long time: at last the king came to him, and said—'I have been at a comedy: and I never was more entertained.'- 'Ah, Sire!' answered Bellicore, 'it is about a tragedy of which I have to speak to you!' And then informed him of what had been lately communicated to him; entreating him, at the same time, to save himself by a vessel, which he could instantly prepare. The king calmly answered him with this line from an old Latin poet—Qui procumbit bumi, non babet unde cadat—' He who lies prostrate on the earth need not fear to fall.'- 'Sire,' said Bellicore, they may occasion bis bead to fall!'

This shews that he did not suspect their cruelties would ever have been carried to the length they were; and it must be confessed, when he had been brought so low, all the rest was persecuting inhumanity.

'KING OF ENGLAND, FRANCE, &c.'

Nothing can be more empty and ridiculous than the title which our monarchs assume of — The Kings of France. It would characterize a great prince to eraze from his true honours this sictitious one. An English monarch should not suffer his dignity to be exposed to the smile of the philosopher.

Charpentier very temperately states the only two principles by which our kings can assumes thi title. The first, from Edward the Third being son of Isabella of France, who was sister to three Kings of France, Louis Hutin, Philip the Long, and Charles the Fair, who died without children: so that Edward, their nephew, disputed the crown of France with Philip de Valois, on the soundation of the Salique law, which had never yet been agitated. This law says, that the kingdom of France ne tombant point eu quenouille: i. e. 'The sceptre of France shall never degenerate into a distass.' The children children of the daughters of France can never succeed to it. As the present monarchs of England are not descendants of this Edward, they cannot have any pretensions to the crown of France, if it had not been a maxim with them, that the rights once devolved on the crown are for ever unalienable and imprescriptible. The second principle is, the donation which Charles the Sixth made of the crown of France to our Henry the Fifth, his son-in-law, to the exclusion of his son Charles the Seventh.

We may add here, that Cromwell offered to sell Cardinal Mazarine all the vouchers for France, which are preserved in the Tower, for a hundred thousand crowns. It was at this price he rated the claims of England to the crown of France; but the Cardinal wisely deemed even that sum too high a price.

If it be a maxim with our crown, of which I am ignorant, that the rights once devolved upon it, are unalienable and imprescriptible, it may be said that we possess the United States of America; but, I believe, this so-vereignty would not be so easily permitted as that of the French monarchy.

WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR.

THAT it is dangerous to exercise our raillery on those men whose 'swords are sharper than their pens,' the present anecdote may verify.

Philip the First, of France, frequently indulged his humour at the expence of the Conqueror's rather too large enbonpoint and prominent belly. When William remained uncommonly long at Rouen, Philip, who did not much approve of his proximity to his court, frequently, in a jesting manner, enquired of his courtiers if they did not know when William would lie-in? The Conqueror, informed of this jest, gave him to understand that, when he should get abroad, he would come to return his compliments, for his kind enquiries, to Saint Genevieve, at Paris, with ten thousand lances, instead of candles! Whatever might be the wit of these monarchs; the arms of William were not contemptible. Such was the vengeance he took for the raillery fhort time the French Vexin, burnt the city of Mantes, and massacred the inhabitants; and, had not his death impeded his progress, he very probably would have conquered France, as he had England.

PARR AND JENKINS.

Or these men, who are singular instances of a patriarchal longevity of life, the reader may not be displeased to attend to the following well-authenticated notices concerning them.

Thomas Parr was born in the last year of King Edward the Fourth, anno 1483. He married his first wife, Jane, at eighty years of age; and, in above thirty years, she brought him but two children, the eldest of which did not live above three years. He married his second wife, Catherine, when he was an hundred and twenty years of age, by whom he had one child. He lived till he had attained to something above one hundred and fifty years of age. Thomas Earlos Arundel caused him to be brought to Westminster about two months before his death: there he passed most of his time in sleep; and an ocular witness has thus described him—

'From head to heel, his body had, all over, A quickfet, thickfet, nat'ral, hairy cover.'

It is supposed this removal, by taking him from his native air, and the disturbance of much company, hastened his death. He died there, November 15, 1634, in the ninth year of King Charles the First, and was buried in the Abbey.

Henry Jenkins lived till he was an hundred and fixty-nine years of age. A remarkable circumstance discovered the age of this man. Being sworn a witness in a cause of an hundred and twenty years, the judge could not help reproving him, till he said he was then butler to the Lord Conyers; and, at length, his name was found in some old register of the Lord Conyer's menial servants. Dr. Tancred Robinson, who sent the account of this man to the Royal Society, adds farther, that Henry Jenkins, coming into his sister's kitchen to beg an alms, he asked him how old he was? After a little pausing, he said, he was about about one hundred and fixty-two or three. The Doctor asked him, what Kings he remembered? He said, 'Henry the Eighth.' What public things he could longest remember? He said, 'the fight at Flowden Field.' Whether the King was there? He said, 'No, he was in France, and the Barl of Surrey was General.' How old he was then? He said, 'About twelve years old.' The Doctor inspected an old Chronicle that was in the house, and found that the battle of Flowden Field was one hundred and sifty-two years before; that the Earl he named was General; and that Henry the Eighth was then at Tournay.

Jenkins from a labourer became a beggar, and could neither write nor read. He lived by alms which he collected about some places in Yorkshire. He died December the 8th, 1670, and lies buried at Bolton in that shire, where, in 1743, a monument was erected to his memory.

THE SENATE OF JESUITS.

There is to be found, in a book intitled—'Interêts et Maximes des Princes et des Etats Souverains, Par M. Le Duc de Rohan; Cologne, 1666'—ananecdote concerning the Jesuits; so much the more curious, as neither Pussendorf or Vertot have noticed it in their Histories, though it's authority cannot be higher. It was probably unknown to them.

When Sigismond, King of Sweden, was elected King of Poland, he made a treaty with the States of Sweden, by which he obliged himself to pass every fifth year in that kingdom. In the course of time, being constrained, by the wars he had with the Ottoman Court, with Muscovy, and Tartary, to remain in Poland, to animate, by his presence, the wars he held with such powerful enemies; he failed, during fifteen years, of accomplishing his promise. To remedy this, in some shape, by the advice of the Jesuits, who had gained the ascendant over him, he created a Senate, which was to reside at Stockholm, composed of forty chosen Jesuits, to decide on every affair of state. He published a declaration in their favour; and presented them with letterspatent, by which he clothed them with the Royal authority.

While this senate of: Jesuits was at Dantzic, waiting for a fair wind to set sail for Stockholm, he published an edict, that they should receive them as his own Royal person. A public Council was immediately held. Charles, the uncle of Sigismond, the prelates, and the Lords, resolved to prepare for them a splendid and magnificent entry.

But, in a private Council, they came to very contrary resolutions: for the Prince said, he could not bear that a Senate of Priests should command, in preserence to all the honours and authority of so many Princes and Lords, natives of the country. All the others agreed with him in rejecting this Holy Senate. It was then the Archbishop rose, and said—'Since Sigismond has disdained to be our King, so also we must must not acknowledge him as such; and, from this moment we should no more con-. sider ourselves as his subjects. His authority is in suspenso, because he has bestowed it on the Jesuits who form this Senate. The People have not yet acknowledged them. In this interval of resignation on the one side, and assumption of the other, I dispense you all of the fidelity the king may claim from you as his Swedish subjects.' When he had said. this, the Prince of Bithynia, addressing himself to Prince Charles, uncle of the King, said -'I own no other King than you; and I believe you are now obliged to receive us as. your affectionate subjects, and to assist us to chase these vermin from the state.' All the others joined him, and acknowledged Charles. as their lawful Monarch.

Having resolved to keep their declaration for some time secret, they deliberated in what manner they were to receive and to precede this Senate in their entry into the harbour, who were on board a great galleon, which they had caused to cast anchor two leagues from Stockholm, that they might enter more magnificently in the night, when the sire-works they had prepared

would appear to the greatest advantage. About the time of their reception, Prince Charles, accompanied by twenty-five or thirty vessels, appeared before the Senate. Wheeling about, and forming a caracol of ships, they discharged a volley, and emptied all their cannon on the galleon of this Senate, which had it's sides pierced through with the balls. The galleon was immediately filled with water, and funk, without one of the unfortunate Jesuits being assisted; on the contrary, they cried to them, that this was the time to perform some miracle, fuch as they were accustomed to do in India and Japan; and, if they chose, they could walk on the waters!

The report of the cannon, and the smoke which the powder occasioned, prevented either the cries or the submersion of the holy fathers from being observed: and, as if they were conducting the Senate to the town, Charles entered triumphantly; went into the church, where they sung Te Deum; and, to conclude the night, he partook of the entertainment which had been prepared for the ill-sated Senate.

The Jesuits of the city of Stockholm having having come, about midnight, to pay their respects to the Fathers of the Senate, perceived their loss. They directly posted up placards of excommunication against Charles and his adherents, who had caused the Senate to perish. They solicited the people to rebel; but they were soon chased from the city, and Charles made a public profession of Lutheranism.

Sigismond, King of Poland, began a war with Charles in 1604, which lasted two years. Disturbed by the invasions of the Tartars, the Muscovites, and the Cossacs, a truce was concluded.

THE LOVER'S HEART.

THE following tale is recorded in the Historical Memoirs of Champagne, by Bougier. It has been a favourite narrative with the old romance writers; and the principal incident, however objectionable, has been displayed in several modern poems. It is probable, that the true history will be acceptable, ceptable, for it's tender and amorous incident, to the fair reader.

Since this little history has been published, I have found it related by Howel, in his 'Familiar Letters,' in one addressed to Ben Jonson. It differs in some minute circumstances. He recommends it to him as a subject 'which peradventure you may make use of in your way:' and concludes by saying—'In my opinion, which vails to your's, this is choice and rich stuff for you to put upon your loom, and make a curious web of.'

The Lord De Coucy, vassal to the Count De Champagne, was one of the most accomplished youths of his time. He loved, with an excess of passion, the lady of the Lord Du Fayel, who selt for him a reciprocal affection. It was with the most poignant grief this lady heard her lover acquaint her, that he had resolved to accompany the King and the Count De Champagne to the wars of the Holy Land; but she could not oppose his wishes, because she hoped that his absence might dissipate the jealousy of her husband. The time of departure having come, these two lovers parted with sorrows.

of the most lively tenderness. The lady, in quitting her lover, presented him with some rings, some diamonds, and with a string that she had woven herself of his own hair, intermixed with silk and buttons of large pearls, to serve him, according to the fashion of those days, to tie a magnificent hood which covered his helmet. This he gratefully accepted, and instantly departed.

When he arrived at Palestine, he received at the siege of Acre, in 1191, in gloriously ascending the ramparts, a wound, which was declared mortal. He employed the sew moments he had to live, in writing to the Lady Du Fayel; and he made use of those fervid expressions which were natural to him in his afflictive situation. He ordered his Squire to embalm his heart after his death, and to convey it to his beloved misters, with the presents he had received from her hands in quitting her.

The Squire, faithful to the dying commands of his master, returned immediately to France, to present the heart and the presents to the Lady of Du Fayel. But, when he approached the castle of this lady, he concealed himself in the neighbouring wood, till till he could find some favourable moment to compleat his promise. He had the misfortune to be observed by the husband of this lady, who recognized him, and who immediately suspected he came in search of his wife with some message from his master. He threatened to deprive him of his life, if he did not divulge what had occasioned him to come there. The Squire gave him for answer, that his master was dead; but Du Fayel not believing it, drew his sword to murder him. This man, frightened at the peril in which he found himself, confessed every thing; and put into his hands the heart and letter of his master. Du Fayel, prompted by the fellest revenge, ordered his cook to mince the heart; and, having mixed it with meat, he caused a ragout to be made, which he knew pleased the taste of his wife, and had it served to her. The lady eat heartily of the dish. After the repast, Du Fayel inquired of his wife, if she had found the ragout according to her taste: she answered him, that she had found it excellent. 'It is for this reason,' he replied, ' that I caused it to be served to you, for it is a kind of meat which you very much liked.

You

You have, Madam,' the savage Du Fayel continued, 'eat the heart of the Lord De Coucy.' But this the would not believe, till he shewed her the letter of her lover, with the string of his hair, and the diamonds she had given him. Then, shuddering in the anguish of her sensations, and urged by the darkest despair, she told him- It is true that I loved that heart, because it merited to be loved: for never could it find it's fuperior; and, fince I have eaten of so noble a meat, and that my stomach is the tomb of so precious a heart, I will take care that nothing of inferior worth shall be mixed with it.' Grief and passion choaked her utterance. She retired into her chamber: she closed the door for ever; and, refusing to accept of consolation or food, the amiable victim expired on the fourth day.

THE HISTORY OF GLOVES.

THE present learned and curious dissertation I have compiled from the papers of an ingenious Antiquarian. The originals are to be found in the Republic of Letters. Vol.X. p. 289.

To proceed regularly, we must first enquire into the antiquity of this part of dress; and secondly, shew it's various uses in the se-veral ages of the world.

Some have given them a very early original, imagining they are noticed in the 108th Psalm, where the Royal Prophet declares, he will cast his Shoe over Edom. They go still higher; supposing them to be used in the times of the Judges, Ruth iv. 7, where it is said, it was the custom for a man to take off his Shoe and give it to his neighbour, as a token of redeeming or exchange ing any thing. They tell us, the word which in these two texts, is usually translated Shoe, is by the Chaldee paraphrast in the latter, Casaubon is of opinion rendered Glove. that Gloves were worn by the Chaldeans, because the word here mentioned is in the Talmud Lexicon explained—the cloathing of the hand. But it must be confessed, all these are mere conjectures; and the Chaldean paraphrast has taken an unallowable liberty in his version.

Let us, then, be content to begin with H h 3 the the authority of Xenophon. He gives a clear and distinct account of Gloves. Speaking of the manners of the Persians, he gives us a proof of their effeminacy; that, not satisfied with covering their head and their feet, they also guarded their hands against the cold with thick Gloves. Homer, speaking of Laertes at work in his garden, represents him with Gloves on bis bands, to secure them from the thorns. Varro, an ancient writer, is an evidence in favour of their antiquity among the Romans. In Lib. ii. Cap. 55. de Re Rustica, he says, that olives gathered by the naked hand, are preferable to those gathered with Gloves. Athenaus speaks of a celebrated glutton, who always came to table with Gloves on his hands, that he might be able to handle and eat the meat while hot, and devour more than the rest of the company.

These authorities shew, that the ancients were not strangers to Gloves; though, perhaps, their use might not be so common as amongst us. When the ancient severity of manners declined, the use of Gloves prevailed among the Romans; but not without some opposition from the Philosophers. Man close of the first century of Christianity, among other invectives against the corruption of the age, says, It is a shame, that persons in persect health should clothe their hands and seet with soft and hairy coverings. Their convenience, however, soon made their use general. Pliny the Younger informs us, in his account of his uncle's journey to Vesuvius, that his secretary sat by him, ready to write down whatever occurred remarkable; and that he had Gloves on his hands, that the coldness of the weather might not impede his business.

In the beginning of the ninth century, the use of Gloves was become so universal, that even the Church thought a regulation in that part of dress necessary. In the reign of Lewis le Debonnaire, the Council of Aix ordered, that the Monks should only wear Gloves made of sheep-skin.

That time has made alterations in the form of this, as in all other apparel, appears from the old pictures and monuments.

Let us now proceed to point out the various uses of Gloves in the several ages; for, beside their original design for a covering of H h 4 the hand, they have been employed on feveral great and solemn occasions: as in the ceremony of Investitures, in bestowing lands; or, in conferring dignities. Giving possession by the delivery of a Glove, prevailed in several parts of Christendom in later ages. In the year 1002, the Bishops of Paderborn and Moncerco were put into possession of their sees by receiving a Glove. It was thought so essential a part of the episcopal habit, that some Abbots in France, prefuming to wear Gloves, the Council of Poitiers interposed in the affair, and forbid them the use of them, on the same footing with the ring and sandals, as being peculiar to Bishops.

Monsieur Favin observes, that the custom of blessing Gloves at the Coronation of the Kings of France, which still subsists, is a remain of the Eastern practice of Investiture by a Glove. A remarkable instance of this ceremony is recorded in the German History. The unfortunate Conradin was deprived of his crown and his life by the usurper Mainfroy. When, having ascended the scassold, the injured Prince lamented his hard sate, he asserted his right to the Crown;

Crown; and, as a token of Investiture, threw his Glove among the crowd; begging it might be conveyed to some of his relations, who should revenge his death. It was taken up by a Knight, who brought it to Peter, King of Arragon, who was afterwards crowned at Palermo.

As the delivery of Gloves was once a part of the ceremony used in giving possession; so the depriving a person of them, was a mark of divesting him of his office, and of degrading him. Andrew Herkla, Earl of Carlisle, was, in the reign of Edward the Second, impeached of holding a correspondence with the Scots, and condemned to die as a traitor. Walsingham, relating other circumstances of his degradation, says—' His spurs were cut off with a hatchet; and his Gloves and shoes were taken off, &c.'

Another use of Gloves was in a duel: on which occasion, he who threw one down, was thereby understood to give defiance; and he who took it up, to accept the challenge.

The use of single combat, at first designed only for a trial of innocence, like the ordeal fire and water, was, in succeeding ages, practited Challenging by the Glove was continued down to the reign of Queen Elizabeth, as appears by an account given by Spelman, of a duel appointed to be fought in Tothili Fields, in the year 1571. The dispute was concerning some lands in the county of Kent. The Plaintiffs appeared in Court, and demanded a single combat. One of them threw down his Glove, which the other immediately took up, carried off on the point of his sword, and the day of fighting was appointed; but the matter was adjusted in an amicable manner by the Queen's judicious interference.

Though such combats are now no longer in use, we have one ceremony still remaining among us, in which the challenge is given by a Glove, viz, at the Compation of the Kings of England: upon which occasion, his Majesty's champion, compleatly armed, and well mounted, enters Westminster Hall, and proclaims that, if any man shall deny the prince's title to the crown, he is ready to maintain and defend it by single combat. After which declaration he throws throws down his Glove, or gauntlet, as a token of defiance.

This custom of challenging by the Glove is still in use in some parts of the world. It is common in Germany, on receiving an affront, to send a Glove to the offending party, as a challenge to a duel.

The last use of Gloves to be mentioned here was for carrying the Hawk, which is very ancient. In former times, princes and other great men took so much pleasure in carrying the hawk on their hand, that some of them have chosen to be represented in this attitude. There is a monument of Philip the First of France still remaining; on which he is represented at length, on his tomb, holding a Glove in his hand.

Mr. Chambers says that, formerly, judges were forbid to wear Gloves on the bench. No reason is assigned for this prohibition. Our judges lie under no such restraint; for both they and the rest of the court make no difficulty of receiving Gloves from the sherisfs, whenever the session or assize concludes without any one receiving sentence of death, which is called a Maiden assize. This custom is of great antiquity.

476 HISTORICAL ANECDOTES.

Our curious antiquarian has also preserved a very singular anecdote concerning Gloves. Chambers informs us, that it is not safe at present to enter the stables of princes without pulling off the Gloves. He does not, indeed, tell us in what the danger consists. A friend from Germany explains the matter. He says, it is an ancient established custom in that country, that whoever enters the stables of a prince, or great man, with his Gloves on his hands, is obliged to forfeit them, or redeem them by a fee to the servants. The same custom is observed in some places at the death of the stag; in which case the Gloves, if not taken off, are redeemed by money given to the huntsmen and keepers. This is practised in France; and the late king never failed of pulling off one of his Gloves on that occasion. The reason of this ceremony is not known.

We meet with the term Glove-money in our old records; by which is meant, money given to servants to buy Gloves. This, no doubt, gave rise to the saying of giving a pair of Gloves, to signify making a present for some savour or service.

To the honour of the Glove, it has more than than once been admitted as a term of the tenure of holding lands, One Bortran, who came in with William the Conqueror, held the manor of Farnham Royal by the service of providing a Glove for the king's right hand on the day of his coronation, and supporting the same hand that day while the king held the royal sceptre. In the year 1177, Simon de Mertin gave a grant of his lands in consideration of sisteen shillings, one pair of white Gloves at Easter, and one pound of cummin.

ANECDOTES OF FASHIONS.

The origin of many, probably of most Fashions, was in the endeavour to conceal some deformity of the inventor. Thus Charles the Seventh, of France, introduced Long Coats, to hide his ill-made legs. Shoes, with very long points, full two seet in length, were invented by Henry Plantagenet, Duke of Anjou, to conceal a very large excrescence which he had upon one of his seet. When Francis I. was obliged-to wear his hair short, owing to a wound he received in the head, it became a pre-vailing fashion at Court.

478 HISTORICAL ANECDOTES.

Sometimes, Fashions are quite reversed in one age from those of another. Thus Bags, when first in fashion in France, were only worn en distabille. In visits of ceremony, the hair was tied in a ribband, and stoated over the shoulders—all which is exactly contrary to our present fashion. Queen Isabella, of Bavaria, as remarkable for her gallantry as the sairness of her complexion, introduced a fashion of leaving the shoulders and part of the neck uncovered.

It is faid that Patches were invented in England in the reign of Edward VI. by an Italian or Spanish lady, who in this manner ingeniously covered a wen which she had on her neck.—When the Spectator wrote (observes his commentator) full-bottomed wigs were invented by a French barber, Duviller, (whose name they bore) for the purpose of concealing a deformity in the shoulders of the Dauphin.

In England, about the reign of Henry the Fourth, they wore long-pointed Shoes, to such an immoderate length, that they could heir knees with chains. Luxury improving in this ridiculous mode, it was the custom of an English Beau of the sourteenth cenury to have these chains of gold or silver. I very accurate account of one of this deciription may be found in Henry's History of Great Britain, in his chapter on Manners, i.e. Vol. IV. The Ladies of that period were not less fantastical in their dress; and t must be confessed, that the most cynical attrist can have no reason, on a comparison with those times, to censure our present nodes.

The curious reader will find ample information on this subject in the sepulchral nonuments of Mr. Gough. In the reign of Richard II. their dress was extravagantly umptuous. Sir John Arundel had a change of no less than 52 new suits of cloth of gold tissue; adapted, I suppose to the number of weeks in the year.—The prelates in Chaucer's age indulged in all the ostentatious luxury of dress; for, he says, though something must be substracted from the account of a satirical bard, that they had, chaunge of clothing everie daie.

480 HISTORICAL ANECDOTES.

The most shameful extravagance in dress is the following one, given by Brantome. Elizabeth of France, Queen to Philip II. of Spain, never wore a gown twice; every day she had a new one; and who can doubt this information, since Brantome assures us that he received it from her majesty's own tailleur, who, he adds, from a poor man, became as rich as any one he knew.

There are flagrant follies in Fashions, which (Marville justly observes) we must suffer while they reign; and which do not appear in a truly ridiculous light, till they happen to be out of sashion. In the reign of Henry III. of France, they could not exist without an abundant use of Comsits. All the world carried in their pockets a Comsit-box, as commonly as we do now snuff-boxes. When the Duke of Guise was killed at Blois, he was found with his Comsit-box in his hand.

Bayle informs us, that short and tight Breeches were so much the rage in France, that Charles V. was obliged to banish this mode by edicts, which Mezeray gives. An Italian author, who wrote in the fifteenth century, supposes that an Italian traveller, whose whose modesty was nice, would not pass through France, because he would not offend his eyes by seeing men whose cloaths did not cover the parts we do not name.

There is some reason for this raillery, for the fashion of wearing short breeches was carried to an extravagance in the French court as well as in our own.

The variety of dresses worn in the reign of Henry the Eighth is alluded to in a print of a naked Englishman holding a piece of cloth-hanging on his right arm, and a pair of shears in his left hand. It was invented by Andrew Borde, a facetious wit of those days. Under the print is an inscription in verse. These are the first lines:

I am an Englishman, and naked I stand here, Musing in my mind, what Rayment I shall were; For now I will were this, and now I will were that, And now I will were, what I cannot tell what.

in Jeffrey's curious collection of habits, in various nations and periods of time, with their different dresses.

Walfingham appears to date the introduction of French fashions among us, from the taking of Calais in 1347.

Fashions frequently derive their names from some temporary circumstances; as after the battle of Steenkirk and Ramilies, cravats were called Steenkirks, and wigs Ramilies.

Jean des Caures, an old French writer, who died in 1586, has written in his Moral Essays a long declamation against the prevailing fashions of his day. Amongst other things, we learn a singular custom which the ladies there had of carrying Mirrers, which were fixed to their waists. For which abomination, with others, he reasonably concludes, they are lost, and will be damned through all eternity. These are some of his expressions—'Alas! in what an age do we live! To see such a depravity on the earth which we see, that induces them even to bring into Church these scandalous Mirrors, which hang about their waists! Let all Histories, divine, human, and prophane, be read; never will it be found, that these objects of vanity were ever thus brought into public by the most meretricious women. It is true, at present, none but the ladies of the court venture to wear them; but it will not be long before every citizen's daughter, and every semale servant will wear them.' This observation is not unjust: The court in every age, and in every country, are the modellers of fashions; so that all the ridicule, of which they are so susceptible, must fall upon them, and not upon the citizens, who are here but service imitators.

To this article, as it may probably arrest the volatile eye of our fair reader, we add what may serve as a hint for the heightening of her charms. Tacitus remarks of Poppea; the Queen of Nero, that she concealed a part of her face: 'To the end;' he adds, 'that the imagination having fuller play by irritating curiosity, they might think higher of her beauty, than if the whole of her face had been exposed.'

There is a sentiment in Tasso beautifully expressed, and which I recommend to the attention of the ladies.

484 HISTORICAL ANECDOTES.

Non copre sue bellezze, e non l'espose,

She did not cover, nor expose her beauties.

It is a fine description of the artless charms of an amiable virgin. Perhaps some apology is needful for concluding this topic with the following juvenile poem.

STANZAS,

ADDRESSED TO LAURA, INTREATING HER NOT TO PAINT, TO POWDER, OR TO GAME, BUT TO RETREAT INTO THE COUNTRY.

AH, LAURA! quit the noisy town,
And FASHION'S persecuting reign:
Health wanders on the breezy down,
And Science on the filent plain.

How long from Art's reflected hues

Shalt thou a mimick charm receive?

Believe, my Fair! the faithful Muse,

They spoil the blush they cannot give.

Must ruthless Art with torturous steel Thy artless locks of gold deface,
In horrid folds their charms conceal,
And spoil at every touch a grace?

Too sweet thy youth's enchanting bloom,

To waste on midnight's fordid crews:

Let wrinkled age the night consume,

For age has but it's hoards to lose.

Sacred to love, and sweet repose,
An arbour's vernal seat is nigh;
That seat the lilac walls inclose,
Safe from pursuing Scandal's eye.

There, as in every lock of gold

Some flower of pleafing hue I weave,

A goddess shall the Muse behold,

And many a votive sigh shall heave.

So the rude Tartar's holy rite,

A feeble MORTAL once array'd;

Then trembled in that mortal's fight,

And own'd DIVINE the power he MADE.

• The Limit, or God of the Tartars, is composed of such frail materials as mere Mortality; contrived, however, by the power of Priest-erast to be Immortal.

MISCELLANEA.

SINGULAR MEMORIES,

THE present is an article that, perhaps, may be thought by many readers apocryphal.

When Muretus was at Rome, (says Scaliger)—by way of parenthesis, I must observe, the relator and the auditor were the two first scholars in Europe—there came, one day, to the palace of the French ambassador, a Florentine of a very ill-favoured countenance, and whose eyes were continually declined on the ground. It was said, that he possessed, in a wonderful degree, an I i 4. Artificial Artificial Memory. To give a proof of his powers, he begged the company, who were numerous, to feat themselves regularly, that he might not be disturbed; and that they would order to be written down to the number of fifty thousand words: affuring them, that if they pronounced them distinctly, and if afterwards they were read flowly, he would repeat every word without hefitation. This was done. They would only have troubled him with a few; but he infifted that they should proceed. The secretary of the ambaffador was employed full two bours in writing the most singular words the company could select; a atnong them was a Cardinal Peleve, who gave him Polyfyllables in the best or longest manner of our late Lexicographer. The Florentine, to the astonishment of the audience, recited them without the imallest omission; and this he did, beginning fometimes at the end, and fometimes in the middle. He said, that this Artificial Memory had caused him totally to lose his natural one.

fedediab Buxton's lingular memory appears to have been of a different cast: he could only count words, ecc. for when he went to the play, he is faid to have enumerated the words of Garrick, and the fleps of the dancers; but he had not, like this man, any one who could be capable of contradicting him.

The memory of the great Daguesseau, Chancellor of France, was extremely fingu-Such were his retentive powers, according to M. Thomas, that it was fufficient for him to have read once attentively any poem, of tolerable length, to recite it correctly. It was in this manner he possessed most of the Greek poetry. At the age of eighty, a man of letters having quoted an epigram of Martial incorrectly, he immediately recited the whole; confessing that he had not read this author fince the age of twelve years. Sometimes he even retained what had been only read to him. one day recited a Satire he had just com-Daguesseau told him, coldly, that pofed. he knew the piece perfectly well; and to convince him of it, repeated it entire. The fatirist, as may be supposed, was furiously agitated; but finished, however, in admiring the felicity of his memory.

A strange anecdote is recorded of Fuller, the To prove the fingular tenaciousness of his memory, 'he undertook once, in passing to and fro from Temple Bar to the farthest part of Cheapside, to tell, at his return, every sign as it stood in order on both sides of the way, repeating them either backwards or forwards; and he did it exactly.' It is also noticed of him, that 'he could repeat five hundred strange words after twice hearing; and could make use of a sermon verbatim, if he once heard it.'

Magliabechi had as singular a memory. To put it to a proof, a gentleman lent him a MS. Some time after it was returned, he came to him, with a melancholy face, to inform him that it was lost. Magliabechi was not so much concerned; for he repeated exactly every word of the MS. which, it is said, he had perfectly retained. It is also said, that when he quoted any author in conversation, he also mentioned the volume and the page.

Calvin had a very faithful memory. It is faid that he never forgot any thing he wilhed to retain. And whenever he was interrupted in his studies, he could always resume resume the thread of his work without being told where he had left it unfinished.

Thomas Dempster, a learned Scotchman of the seventeenth century, declared he never knew what it was to forget. It is probable he did not speak truth: if he did, he must have been the eighth wonder of the world; for he read sourteen hours every day. But, with all his memory, he could not remember to write with elegance, so that he was never a favourite.

Egnatius, a polished Italian, was also distinguished for a fine memory. One day, when he was haranguing his audience, he had nearly finished, when the Pope's Nuncio entered. He re-commenced his discourse, and repeated it exactly; only he heightened the diction and displayed more eloquence than the first time. The Venetian senators, as well as literary men, used to consult him; and he always answered their interrogatories without having recourse to his books.

Ubbo Emmius, professor at Groninguen, had a prodigious memory; dissicult to be credited. It is related of him, that he could readily answer any questions in history without mistaking the minutest circumstances of time, time, place, or persons. He even recollected the figure, situation, and magnitude of towns and sortresses; the position of the rivers and highways; the heights of the mountains, &c.

This little sketch will be sufficient; it could, however, be augmented. Bayle observes, that Memory is the first thing that dies in men of letters.

The following curious observations on memory I find in the Bibliotheque Raisonnée, an Amsterdam Literary Journal, which was published by the Wetsteins. Vol. xhx. p. 90.

Memory does not differ from Imagination. Without Memory we can imagine nothing, and without Imagination we cannot recollect. I do not know if the ancients were not acquainted with the mechanical Art of Memory. They have at least emphatically expressed it, by the word Recordatio, as if one should say, to memorife; that is, to touch those cords which have excited such and such ideas. When I see an orator decline his head, knit his brows, rub his temples, I represent his situation by that of a poor traveller, who is lost in a town, knocking at every every door till he has found him whom he fought.

- What is called a great Memory, is only a great facility to move certain fibres of the brain. The old man only feels a want of Memory, because he cannot put them in action.
- 'I knew one of ninety, who forgot from day to day all that he saw, all that he heard, but who said, he remembered with case the sields and the woods where he had kept sheep in his youth. The sibres we are accustomed to move from our infancy have a more durable mobility: exercise nourishes and strengthens them.'

These are good arguments to shew the necessity of our youths daily exercising this mental faculty. And perhaps those instances which I have collected of so many great men possessing it in almost an incredible degree, arose from their having practised it regularly by their continued studies.

A HEAVY HEART.

This is an ancient vulgar phrase; and it will be found, like the generality of similar phrases which have been long current, not destitute of signification. According to many eminent physicians, timid men have the heart very thick and heavy. Rioland relates, that he has sometimes met with the hearts of persons, of this description, which have weighed from two to three pounds. Amongst these was that of Mary De Medicis, which was nearly of the latter weight. It is probable, that the afflictions and the griefs of this unfortunate princess did not a little contribute to thicken and render 'ber beart beavy.'

BEARDS THE DELIGHT OF ANCIENT BEAUTIES.

WHEN the Fair were accustomed to behold their lovers with beards, the sight of a shaved a shaved chin excited sentiments of horror and aversion; as much indeed as, in this effeminate age, would a gallant whose 'hairy excrement' should

6 Stream like a sactoor to the troubled air."

To obey the injunctions of his Bishops, Louis the Seventh of France cropped his hair, and shaved his beard. Eleanor of Acquitaine, his consort, found him, with this uncommon appearance, very ridiculous, and very contemptible. She revenged herfelf, by becoming something more than a coquette. The King obtained a divorce. She then married the Count of Anjou, Henry II. who shortly after ascended the English throne. She gave him, for her marriage dower, the rich provinces of Poitou and Guienne; and this was the origin of those wars which for three hundred years ravaged France, and which cost the French nation three millions of men. All which, probably, had never taken place, if Louis the Seventh had not been so rash as to crop his hair and shave his beard, by which he became so disgustful in the eyes of the fair Eleanor.

ON THE FAIR-SEX HAVING NO SOULS! AND ON OLD WOMEN.

A SPANISH author has affirmed, that: brutes have no fouls; a French writer supports the same opinion; but an Italian, more bold, las ventured to maintain that the fair-jex have likewise no souls, and are of another species of animal to man. This the author shews by various proofs drawn from the Scriptures, which he explains according to his own fancy. While this book was published in Latin, the Inquisition remained filent; but, when it was translated into the vulgar tongue, they censured and prohibited it. The Italian ladies were divided, on this occasion, into two opposite parties; the one was greatly enraged to be made so inferior to the other sex; and the other, considering themselves only as machines, were content to amuse themselves in playing off the springs in the manner most agreeable to themselves.

The Author of the Commentary on the Epiftles

Epistles of St. Paul, falsely ascribed to St. Ambrose, says, on the eleventh chapter of the first Epistle to the Corinthians, that women are not made according to the image of the Creator.

The Mahometans are known to hold the same opinions concerning the souls of the semale sex. Very ungallantly, each Jew, among his morning benedictions, includes one to thank God he has not made him a woman, and the semale Israelites retort by a very indecent self-selicitation.

Besides this indignity offered to the fair-sex, Howel tells us, that as 'it was an opinion of the Jews that woman is of an inferior creation to man, being made only for multiplication and pleasure, therefore hath she no admittance into the body of the synangogue.'

When Rousseau published his Letters from the Mountains, his enemies, who were but too numerous, spread a report amongst the semales in the village of Motiers, where he resided, and about it's environs, that he had asserted that Women bad no Souls: a circumstance that really put the poor philosopher in danger of sharing the sate of Orpheus.

Vol. I. Kk It

It was fortunate for him that the season confined him to his house, as he would have been put in the last peril (as the French express it) from these furious Bacchants, whose termagant spirits were irritated to the highest pitch in behalf of their suspected souls.

Butler says in his Cervantic poem-

Yes, 'tis in vain to think to guess
At Women by appearances;
That paint and patch their imperfections
Of intellectual complections;
And daub their tempers o'er with washes
As artificial as their faces.

If some have been found to suspect the fair-sex are deprived of souls, most seem to treat old women as if they indeed had none. We do not feel for them all that esteem, which the recollection of their amiable youth might inspire.

An old woman' has become a term of reproach; yet I do not see why it should be more so than 'an old man,' which, however, is frequently alledged as a reason for our paying an extraordinary deserence to the person whose age is supposed to have claims claims on our veneration. Certain fenility does not always indicate wisdom: it may, with the ladies, be graced by the remains of a beautiful face, and sometimes of engaging manners. Ninon de L'Enclos concealed love amidst her wrinkles.

In rude nations the fate of old women is fingularly unfortunate. They are totally despised, and sometimes suffer death. Mr. Muller informs us, that an Ostiac never approaches his wife after her fortieth year. He is, however, so kind as to keep her to regulate his domestic affairs, and to serve the young woman whom he has selected to occupy her former place.

Old women, in various parts of Africa, are subjected to a most rigorous chastity; and their slightest freedoms serve for a pretence to punish them by the sword, and even by fire!

In Negroland they sell them as soon as their beauty is on the decline; and, with the produce of this matrimonial commerce, they purchase young girls more frolicksome and handsome.

Bayle has smartly said of the age of ladies

K k 2 —that

—that it is the only thing they can keep in profound secresy.

ADAM NOT THE FIRST MAN.

Among the many singular opinions which some have endeavoured to establish, and in which indeed they have themselves firmly confided, not the least to be distinguished, is that of one Isaac de la Peyrere, of Bourdeaux. He is the author of a book entitled, 'The Pre-Adamites,' where he attempts to shew that Adam is not the first of men. He was always dreaming on this during his life, and died in it's firm belief. He would have been glad to have known, that an ancient Rabbin was fo much inclined towards his system, that he has even ventured to reveal the name of the Preceptor of Adam! But this Rabbin (as Menage observes) was a Rabbin, and that is saying enough.

When this book first made it's appearance, it was condemned to be burnt by the hand of the common hangman. Meaage has preserved a pretty Bon Mot of the Prince de Guemene which passed about the time this book made a noise. One Father Adam, a Jesuit, preached at St. Germain, before the Queen. The fermon was execrable; and being at the fame time very personal, was greatly difliked at Court. The Queen fpoke concerning it to the Prince, and asked him his opinion. 'Madam,' he replied, I am a Pre-Adamite.'- What does that mean?' faid the Queen.—' It is, Madam,' the Prince wittily answered, "that I do not think Father Adam to be the first of men. Voltaire, at Ferney, had also a Pere-Adam, on whom he frequently played off this witticism of the Prince; and those who are acquainted with his creed, may believe that his observations on Father Adam were not a little pungent.

These Pre-Adamites bring to my recollection two humorous lines of Prior, in his Alma—

And left I should be wearied, Madam,
To cut things short, come down to Adam.

In the Memoirs of Niceron are the titles of twelve treatifes published against Isaac K k 3 de de la Peyrere, the Pre-Adamite. And this satirical epitaph was also composed on him, that after having been pleased with sour religions at once, he became a Pre-Adamite; but his indifference was such, that; after eighty years, he had to choose one, the good man died without choosing any.

La Peyrere ici-gît, ce bon Israelite,
Huguenot, Catholique, enfin Pre-Adamite, Quatre religions lui plurent à la fois,
Et son indifference etoit si peu commune,
Qu'apres quatre vingt ans qu'il eut a faire un choix,
Le bon homme partit, et n'en choisit aucune.

Loredano, a noble Venetian, who lived in the last century, has written The Life of Adam. This work is translated by Richard Murray, 1748. It is composed with great wit and delicacy; but the world, in those times less profane, was shocked at the romantic, and licentious air, which prevails throughout the work. This is the occupation which he gives, even to the divine Being himself, just after the first sin of Adam—

'In the mean time God walked in the garden, amidst the freshness of the cool zephyss, when, when, at the decline of day, they blow with increased force. This action of the divine Majesty shews the disquietude which the sin of Man occasioned him, since, to moderate his just indignation, he seemed to want the aid of the evening breezes, which blow with a tempering coolness.

On this licentious thought Bayle obferves, that a Pagan poet would hardly have been excusable to have written such a circumstance relative to Jupiter.

On the name of Adam, there is a neat epigram by the Duke of Saint Agnan. He addressed it to a samous poetic Carpenter, whose name was Maitre Adam, and whose verses slowed from a charming natural talent. He says, that for his verses, and his name, he was the first man in the world, Ornement du Siecle ou nous sommes, Vous n'aurez rien de moi, si non Que pour les vers, et pour le nom Vous etes, le premier des Hommes.

THE ABBENT MAN.

WITH the character of Bruyere's Abfent Man, the reader is well acquainted. It is translated in the Spectator, and it has been exhibited on the Theatre. The general opinion runs, that it is a fictitious character, or, at least, one the Author has too highly coloured; it was well known, however, to his contemporaries; to be the Count De Branças. The present Anecdotes concerning the same person, have been unknown to, or forgotten by, Bruyere; and, as they are undoubtedly genui ;, and, at the fame time, to the full as extraordinary as those which characterize M. alcas, or the Absent Man, it is but reaso sle to suppose, that however improbable it may appear, it is a faithful delineation of an anomalous character.

The Count was reading by the fire-fide, but Heaven knows with what degree of attention, when the nurse brought him his infant-child. He throws down the beatter he takes the child in his arms—he was playing with her, when an important visitor was announced. Having forgot he had quitted his book, and that it was his child he held in his hands, he hastily slung the squalling innocent on the table.

The Count was walking in the street, and the Duke de la Rochesoucault crossed the way, to speak to him. 'God bless thee, poor man!' exclaimed the Count. Rochesoucault smiled, and was beginning to address him—'Is it not enough,' cried the Count, interrupting him, and somewhat in a passion; is it not enough that I have said, at first, I have nothing for you? Such lazy beggars as you hinder a gentleman from walking the streets.' Rochesoucault burst into a loud laugh; and awakening the Absent Man from his lethargy, he was not a little surprised, himself, that he should take his friend for an importunate mendicant!

WAX-WORK.

WAX-WORK has been brought sometimes to a wonderful perfection. We have heard heard of many curious deceptions occasioned by the imitative powers of this plastic matter. There have been several exhibitions in London, which have pretended to an excellence they did not attain. It must be confessed, that a saloon, occupied by figures that represent eminent personages, forms a grand idea. To approach Voltaire, Franklin, or the great Frederick, yields to their admirers a delightful sensation. If we contemplate with pleasure an insipid Portrait, how much greater is the pleasure, when, in an assemblage, they appear wanting nothing but that language and those actions which a fine imagination can instantaneously beflow!

There was a work of this kind which Menage has noticed, and which must have appeared a little miracle. In the year 1675, the Duke of Maine received a gilt cabinet, about the size of a moderate table. On the door was inscribed—The Chamber of Wit. The inside displayed an alcove and a long gallery. In an arm-chair was seated the sigure of the Duke himself, composed of wax, the resemblance the most perfect imaginable. On one side stood the Duke de la Roche-Rochefoucault, to whom he presented a paper of verses for his examination. De Marcillac, and Bossuet, Bishop of Meaux, were standing near the arm-chair. In the alcove, Madame de Thianges and Madame de la Fayette sat retired reading a book. Boileau, the satirist, stood at the door of the gallery, hindering seven or eight bad poets from entering. Near Boileau stood Racine, who seemed to beckon to La Fontaine to come forwards. All these figures were formed of wax; and this imitation must have been at once curious for it's ingenuity, and interesting for the personages it imitated.

CURIOUS AUTOMATA.

When Descartes resided in Holland, with great labour and industry he made a semale Automaton—which occasioned some wicked wits to publish that he had an illegitimate daughter, named Franchine—to prove demonstratively that beasts have no souls, and that they are but machines nicely composed, and moves whenever another body strikes them, them, and communicates to them a portion of their motions. Having put this fingular machine into a case on board a vessel, the Dutch captain, who sometimes heard it move, had the curiosity to open the box. Astonished to see a little human form extremely animated, yet, when touched, appearing to be nothing but wood; little versed in science, but greatly addicted to superstition, he took the ingenious labour of the philosopher for a little devil, and terminated the experiment of Descartes by throwing his Wooden Daughter into the sea.

To this account of a curious Automaton, composed by a philosopher, I shall add another, of one which was made by the mere ingenuity of a natural genius, and which seems to have displayed even more striking effects. The one was the idol of philosophy, the other of religion. The following description is in Lambard's Perambulations. Kent, p. 227. For an account of Lambard, see Mr. Gough's British Topography.

'A carpenter of our country being a prifoner in France, got together fit matter for his purpose, and compacted of wood, wire, paste, paste, and paper, a Rood of such exquisite art and excellence, that it not only matched in comeliness and due proportion of parts the best of the common sort; but, in strange motion, variety of gesture, and nimbleness of joints, passed all others that before had been seen; the same béing able to bow down and lift up itself; to shake and stir the hands and feet; to nod the head, and roll the eyes; to wag the chaps; to bend the brows: and, finally, to represent to the eye both the proper motion of each member of the body, and also a lively and significant shew of a well-contented, or displeased, mind; biting the lip, and gathering a frowning, froward, and disdainful face, when it would pretend offence; and shewing a most mild, amiable, and smiling cheer and countenance, when it would feem to be wellpleased.

'This was the Rood of Grace at Boxley, which was by Bishop Fisher exposed at Paul's Cross for a cheat, and broke to pieces.'

By similar works, and which have been less happily executed, how many religious frauds have been successfully practised. Mr.

Gough notices this piece of religious mumimery in his Camden, vol. I. p. 232, in a funmary way. These particulars may gratify the curious, who are not antiquaries. Mr. Twiss, in his Chess, has given an accurate account of An Automaton Chess-Player, vol. I. p. 12.

PASQUIN AND MARFORIO.

All the world have heard of these Sta's tues: they have served as vehicles for the keenest satire in a land of the most uncontrouled despotism. The Statue of Pasquin (from whence the word Pasquinade ) and that of Marforio, are placed in Rome, in two different quarters. Marforio's is a Statue that lies at it's whole length: it represents, according to some, Panarium Jovum; and, according to others, the River Rbine, or the Nar. That of Pajquin is a marble Statue, greatly mutilated, which stands at the corner of the Palace of the Ursinos, and it is supposed to be the figure of a Gladiator. Whatever they may have been, is now of little little consequence: it is certain that to one or other of these Statues are affixed, during the concealment of the night, those satires or lampoons which the authors wish should be dispersed about Rome without any danger to themselves. When Marforio is attacked, Pasquin comes to his succour; and when Pasquin is the sufferer, he finds in Marforio a constant defender. It is thus, with a thrust and a parry, the most serious matters are disclosed; and the most illustrious personages are attacked by their enemies, and defended by their friends.

An anonymous author has given us the following account of the origin of the name of the Statue of Pafquin.—A fatirical shoemaker, who lived at Rome, and whose name was Pafquin, amused himself with rallying very severely those who passed by his shop. He soon became famous; and had he had time to publish, he would have been the Peter Pindar of his day. But his genius seems to have been satisfied to rest on his shop-board. Some time after his death there was found under the pavement of his shop this statue of an ancient Gladiator. It was soon set up; and, by universal confent, fent, was inscribed with his name. And they attempt to raise him from the dead, by frequently reviving his spirit, and rendering the statue worthy of the name it bears.

I have not discovered the origin of the name of Marforio.

MUSIC:

NATURALISTS pretend, that animals and birds, as well as 'knotted oaks,' as Congreve informs us, are exquisitely sensible to the charms of Music. This may serve as an instance:—An officer, having spoken somewhat too free of the Minister Louvois, was -as once was the custom-immediately configned to the Bastile. He begged the governor to permit him the use of his lute, to soften, by the harmonies of his instrument; the rigours of his prison. At the end of a few days, this modern Orpheus, playing on his lute, was greatly astonished to see frisking out of their holes great numbers of mice; and, descending from their woven habitations, crowds of spiders, who formed a circle circle about him, while he continued breathing his soul-subduing instrument. His surprize was at first so great, that he was petrified with astonishment; when, having ceased to play, the affembly, who did not come to see his person, but to hear his instrument, immediately broke up. As he had a great dislike to spiders, it was two days before he ventured again to touch his instrument. At length, having conquered, for the novelty of his company, his dislike of them, he recommenced his concert, when the assembly was by far more numerous than at first; and, in the course of farther time, he found himself surrounded by a hundred musical amateurs. Having thus succeeded in attracting this company, he treacheroully contrived to get rid of them at his will. For this purpose, he begged the keeper to give him a car, which he put in a cage, and let loose at the very instant when the little hairy people were most entranced by the Orphean skill he displayed.

Marville has given us the following curious anecdote on this subject. He says, that doubting the truth of those who say it is natural for us to love Music, especially Vol. I.

the found of instruments, and that beasts themselves are touched with it, being one day in the country, I enquired into the truth; and, while a man was playing on the trump marine, made my observations on a cat, a dog, a horse, an ass, a hind, cows, small birds, and a cock and hens, who were in a yard, under a window on which I was leaning. I did not perceive that the cat was the least affected, and I even judged, by her air, that she would have given all the instruments in the world for a mouse, sleeping in the sun all the time; the horse stopped short from time to time before the window, lifting his head up now and then, as he was feeding on the grass; the dog continued for above an hour seated on his hind legs, looking Acdfastly at the player; the ass did not discover the least indication of his being touched, eating his thistles peaceably; the hind lifted up her large wide ears, and seemed very attentive; the cows slept a little, and after gazing as though they had been acquainted with us, went forward: some little birds who were in an aviary, and others on the trees and bushes, almost tore their little throats throats with finging; but the cock, who minded only his hens, and the hens who were folely employed in scraping on a neighbouring dunghill, did not shew in any manner that they took the least pleasure in hearing the trump marine.

A modern traveller assures us, that he has repeatedly observed in the island of Madeira, that the lizards are attracted by the notes of Music; and that he has assembled a number of them by the powers of his instrument. He tells us also, that when the Negroes catch them, for food, they accompany the chace by whistling some tune, which has always the effect of drawing great numbers towards them.

Ludicrous as the above anecdotes may appear, I cannot but be of opinion, that Music forcibly affects the human mind. Mr. Jackson, the originality of whose observations is acknowledged, and who is himself so admirable a master in the art, in one of his thirty letters, farcastically asks, in return to the question of a great Poet, what passion cannot Music raise or quell? what passion can Music raise or quell? The following L12 anecdote, anecdote, which I transcribe from the Laurereat's commentary on Aristotle, p. 114, is more interesting, and perhaps more strongly displays the power of Music than any other recorded of ancient times.

'The RANS DES VACHES, mentioned by Rousseau, in his dictionary of Music, though without any thing striking in the composition, has such a powerful insuence over the Swiss, and impresses them with so violent a desire to return to their own country, that it is forbidden to be played in the Swiss Regiments, in the French service, on pain of death.'

LOCUSTS.

THE Locusts, so frequently mentioned in the Scriptures, and in many ancient Authors, are a species of Grashoppers that have nothing in them disgustful. The Parthians, the Ethiopians, and the Arabs, found them delicious food. After causing them to fall from the trees by means of smoke, ascending from fires kindled at their feet, they salted, falted, dried them in the fun, and preferved them for food throughout the year. Saint John the Baptist ate them with wild honey, according to the custom of the poor of those times. They appear sometimes in Asia, and in Africa, in fuch prodigious numbers, that they darken the air, and confume in an instant the fruits and herbage of a whole country; the heaps of those which die infect the air and occasion a contagion. It is probable, that these Phenomena are the Harpies of the ancients, which even came to devour the meats on the table of the King of Bythinia; and if we add, that Calais and Zethus, the Children of Boreas, chased them from this country, and pursued them to the Isles of Strophades, which are in the Ionian Sea, where they caused them to perish, all this fiction may be understood thus—that the Northern winds had blown them into this Sea: and it is true, that nothing so certainly delivers a country which is infected with these insects, as a strong wind that carries them off to the Sea, where they infallibly must perish. On this head the Reader may confult Goldsmith.

effects have occasioned the Faculty to place it among their best remedies.

The use of Coffee is said to have a similar origin; that, however, was never attended with such dreadful effects. A Prior of a monastery in the part of Arabia where this berry grows, having remarked that the goats who ate of it became extremely brisk and alert, resolved to try the experiment on his Monks, of whom he so continually complained for their lethargic propensities. The experiment turned out successful; and it is said, it was owing to this circumstance that the use of this Arabian berry came to be so universal.

A casual circumstance discovered that excellent sebrifuge, the Jesuit's Bark. An Indian, in a delirious sever, having been lest by his companions by the side of a river, as incurable, to quench his burning thirst, he naturally drank copious draughts of the water, which having long imbibed the virtues of the bark which abundantly sloated on the stream, it quickly dispersed the sever of the Indian. He returned to his friends; and having explained the nature of his remedy, the indisposed crouded shout the margin margin of the holy stream, as they imagined it to be, till they perfectly exhausted all it's virtues. The sages of the tribe, however, found at length in what consisted the estimated of the stream. The Americans discovered it, in the year 1640, to the lady of the Viceroy of Peru, who recovered by it's use from a dangerous sever. In 1649 the reputation of this remedy was spread about Spain, Italy, and Rome, by the Cardinal de Lugo, and other Jesuits. And thus, like the Antimony, it's name is significant of it's origin.

Furctiere tells us in his dictionary, at the word Quinquina, that this febrifuge was called, in the beginning, Cardinal de Lago's Bark, who distributed it very freely, though it was then extremely dear. Like all new discoveries, it was much opposed in it's commencement.

This writer, who is for ever accounting for things in an uncommon way, has a very strange notion respecting Bark. I shall transcribe his words. I am of opinion the foresaid drug is artificially prepared, and that the tree spoken of affords nothing but the wood, into which the bitter taste is immitted, by macerating it a convenient time in the juice of a certain Indian plant, to which that penetrating bitterness is peculiar. This having sufficiently infinuated into the pores of the bark, it is exposed to the fun, which knits it together into a folider texture. Hence it is that the bark, being reduced to powder, and steeped in any liquor, doth so easily part with it's bitterness, as being adventitious to it, and not connate to it's effential principles. given this extract to shew what fancies are indulged by certain geniuses against the most valuable discoveries when they are first made.

ANIMAL'S IMITATE LANGUAGE AND ACTION.

SIR William Temple, in his Memoirs, relates a story concerning an old parrot, belonging to the Prince Maurice, that readily answered to several questions promiseuously put to it. However singular the fact may appear, he assures us it was told him as such by the Prince himself.

Scaliger tells us that he saw a crow, in the French King's court, that was taught to fly at partridges, or any other fowl, from the falconer's hand.

Cardinal Assanio had a parrot that was taught to repeat the Apostles Creed, verbatim, in Latin: and in the court of Spain there was one that could sing the Gamut perfectly.

In the Roman History an anecdote is recorded, the truth of which we have no reason fon to doubt. When the fovereignty of the world was depending between Cafar and Antony, a poor man at Rome bred up two crows, and taught them to pronounce, in their prattling language, a salutation to the Emperor; and, that he might be provided against all events, one of them saluted Cæsar, and the other Antony. When Augustus: was returning as the conqueror, this man, with the crow on his hand, mer him; and it was an ingenious and agreeable flattery. to which Augustus was not insensible, to be saluted by a crow with the acclamations of victory. He rewarded the novel adulator: munificently. The neighbour of the man, however, having in vain essayed to teach: the same language to two crows he had do-: stined for this purpose, stung with envy at: his happier fate, revealed to Augustus that this man had another crow at his bouse, with which he had intended to have faluted. Antony, had Fortune favoured his party. This malicious intelligence intercepted the bounty of Augustus.

Perhaps nothing appears more wonderful. than the fight of an unweildy Elephant dancing. The manner of teaching this.

grave animal so ludicrous an action is thus cruelly practised—They bring a young Elephant upon an iron stoor heated underneath; and play on a musical instrument, while he lists up his legs, and shifts his feet about, by reason of the torture of the heat. This, frequently repeated, occasions him to dance at the least sound of music.

But let us not suppose, that animals that thus imitate the actions and language of Rational Creatures, possess, therefore, in some degree, rationality and mental intelligence: for when an Elephant, for instance, dances to music, it is not from any principles of reason, but from the concatenation of the two ideas of beat and music, to which custom has habituated him. So a Parrot may answer any question it is accustomed to hear; but this action needs not the aid of reason, since it may be effected by an babitual idea of things. Even the inferior ranks of animals receive their ideas by the fenfes. Such and such sounds often repeated, and fuch and fuch actions immediately preceding or immediately following those sounds, must necessarily form a complex idea both of the found and action; so that, when either

either such action or such sound is repeated, an idea of the other must necessarily attendit. Thus Dogs are taught to fetch and carry; and Parrots speak more words than one together. These words, Poor Poll! for instance, being often repeated together, if one be mentioned, and the other lest, there must necessarily be an idea of the other sound, because custom and habit link them tagether. As two words are taught, so may three; and, if three, why not many? It is thus, by a complex idea, the Elephant dances; for, when he hears music, the idea of the heated sloor occasions him to dance.

The arguments here alledged for the power which some animals shew in imitating our speech and actions, are chiefly drawn from an old Athenian Mercury.

FEMALE BEAUTY, AND ORNAMENTS.

THE Ladies in Japan gild their teeth; and those of the Indies paint them red. The blackest teeth are esteemed the most beautiful in Guzurat, and in some parts of Ame-

In Greenland, the women colour their faces with blue and yellow. However fresh the complexion of a Muscovite may be, she would think herself very ugly if the was not plaistered over with paint. The Chinese must have their feet as diminutive as those of the she-goats; and, to render. them thus, their youth is passed in tortures. In Ancient Persia, an aquiline nose was often thought worthy of the crown; and, if there was any competition between two Princes, the people generally went by this criterion of majesty. In some countries, the mothers break the noses of their children; and, in others, press the head between two boards, that it may become square. The modern Persians have a strong aversion to red hair: the Turks, on the contrary, are warm admirers of these disgusting locks. The Indian Beauty is thickly smeared with bear's fat; and the female Hottentot receives from the hand of her lover, not filks, or wreaths of flowers, but warm guts and reeking tripe, to dreis herself with enviable ornamients.

In China, small eyes are liked; and the girls are continually plucking their eyebrows, that they may be small and long.

The Turkish women dip a gold brush in the tincture of a black drug, which they pass over their eye-brows. It is too visible by day, but looks shining by night. They tinge their nails with a rose-colour.

An ornament for the nose appears to us persectly unnecessary. The Peruvians, however, think otherwise; and they hang on it a weighty ring, the thickness of which is proportioned by the rank of their husbands. The custom of boring it, as our ladies do their ears, is very common in several nations. Through the personation are hung various materials; such as green crystal, gold, stones, a single and sometimes a great number of gold rings. This is rather troublesome to them in blowing their noses; and the sact is, some have informed us, that the Indian ladies never persorn this very useful operation.

The female head-dress is carried, in some countries, to singular extravagance. The Chinese Fair carries on her head the figure of a certain bird. This bird is composed of copper, or of gold, according to the quality of the person: the wings, spread out, fall Vol. I, over the front of the head-dress, and conceal the temples. The tail, long and open, forms a beautiful tust of feathers. The beak covers the top of the nose; the neck is fastened to the body of the artificial animal by a spring, that it may the more freely play, and tremble at the slightest motion.

The extravagance of the Myantses is far more ridiculous than the above. They carry on their heads a slight board, rather longer than a foot, and about six inches broad: with this they cover their hair, and seal it with wax. They cannot lie down, nor lean, without keeping the neck very straight; and, the country being very woody, it is not uncommon to find them with their head-dress entangled in the trees. Whenever they comb their hair, they pass an hour by the fire in melting the wax; but this combing is only performed once or twice a year.

To this curious account, extracted from Duhalde, we must join that of the inhabitants of the Land of Natal. They wear caps, or bonnets, from six to ten inches high, composed of the sat of oxen. They then gradually dually amoint the head with a purer greafe; which, mixing with the hair, fastens these bonnets for their lives!

HELL.

THE Cardinal Bellarmin, in his Treatife du Purgatoire, seems to be as familiarly acquainted with the secret tracks and the formidable divisions of the bottomless pit, as Swedenburgh was with the streets and byecorners of the New Jerusalem.

He informs us that there are, beneath the earth, four different places, or a profound place divided into four parts. He says, that the deepest place is Hell; which contains all the souls of the darmed, where will be also their bodies after the Resurrection, and where likewise will be inclosed all the Demons. The place nearest Hell is Purgatory, where souls are purged; or, rather, where they appeals the anger of God by their sufferings. He says, that the same fires, and the same torments, alike afflict in both these places; and that the only difference between Hell and Purgatory, confifts in their duration. Next to Purgatory is the Limbo of those Infants who die without having received the Sacrament: and the fourth place is the Limbo of the Fathers; that is to say, of those Just Men who died before the death of Jesus Christ. But since the days of the Redeemer this last division is empty; so that here is an apartment to be let!

Such ideas are the tenets which some, from the dawn of their reason, entertain with religious veneration. It has even been acknowledged by the bigots, that the more ridiculous, or the more unintelligible, may be the subject for belief, the greater merit it is to receive it without helitation. Men have perfunded themselves, that what bears the strongest evidence of falshood, is the sacred truth of a paternal Deity. And it had been well if, on speculative points, they had only differed with their more rational or innocent fellow-creatures. But these bigots have written, in the warm blood of humanity, the articles of their faith. They have reared an altar to Superstition, on which they have not facrificed the Scape-Goat, or the Paschal Lamb; but they have plunged the facerdotal facerdotal knife into the bosom of their fellow-creatures. They have agonized the individual with the flaming Auto da fés of the Inquisition: with a more dreadful scope they have sent thousands, with the sword of the Crusade, to spread desolation in parts which had never till then heard of their name; and, gratifying at once their avarice and their religion, cities have been razed, and millions of inoffensive men swept from the face of the earth, because it had pleased Providence to place in their countries mines of gold and seas of pearl.

Prudentius, a Christian Poet, whose verse is not so much the inspiration of the muse, as the effusions of the Saint (indeed he began to write verse so late as fifty) has given us several circumstances concerning Hell, though it is rather difficult to guess where he got his intelligence. He tells us, for a certain sact, that the damned have every year one day of repose; and that is, the day when Jesus Christ issued from Hell. He consoles us also, by informing us that God does not take offence lightly; so that Hell is not so crowded as it is imagined.

Cicero assures us, that there was not an M m 3 old old woman in his time who lent any faith to the torments of Hell; and on this occasion he observes, that Fabulous Traditions weaken in the course of time, but that Time serves to establish Truth: and that it is to this reason we must attribute the long and the growing veneration which is rendered to the gods. Bayle supplies me with this observation.

ANATOMISTS.

The ancient Anatomists must have selt a zeal for the science which makes the imagination shudder. It was nothing less than dissecting men alive; for this purpose, the bodies of criminals were devoted. This was the exercise of Herophilus, an ancient Physician, who Tertullian very justly treats as a Butcher; or, as we might say in the present age, a Cannibal.

MONKS.

'THE Monks of the present day,' says Charpentier, who died in the year 1702, · lead fober lives, when compared with their predeceffors.' Some religious Fathers were called The Hogs of Saint Anthony. They retired from the world to make eight repasts per diem! The order of the Chartreux was of a different complexion. It was, in it's original institution, more austere than that of La Trappe. Amongst other regulations for their food, it was written, that with barley bread, water, and pulse, they were fully satisfied. And again, they promise to preserve 'perpetual fasting, perpetual filence, and perpetual hair-cloth.' Every Saturday night was brought to each Father his portion of food for the week, with which they accommodated themselves in their own cells, widely separated from each other. But this mortification was not long held in esteem: their severities were mitigated, more and more, till at length  $Mm_4$

they have improved the order greatly, by admitting many of the luxuries of life. They now eat, instead of the dry barley bread which was brought to them on the Saturday nights, the newest loaves, made of the whitest flour; instead of water, they drink the richest wines, in greater quantities than heretofore they drank water. The pulse was found rather insipid food; so they have joined to it excellent sish: and, in fact, there is no luxury in which these Fathers, who were enjoined by their Founder 'perpetual safts,' do not indulge their appetites.

Where slumber Abbots, purple as their wines!'
Pope.

Mr. Merry, the Author of the Della. Crusca Poems, when he can get rid of his load of poetic tinsel, presents sometimes a thought of the true gold. He has written an Elegy on a View of the Chartreux; in which are these excellent lines—

'Tis not by losing Life that Heaven ye gain; It is not Solitude that leads to Gop.'

PIOUS FRÁUDS.

The Abbey of Signi, in Champagne, was uncommonly rich and extensive: but at this we must not be assonished. Saint Bernard had promised those who assisted to found it, as much "Spatium," or place in Heaven, as they gave land to his Order of Citeaux. The good people of those days had more faith in Saints than their graceless posterity; and, had the Magistrates not restrained their pious zeal, this Abbey would have occupied a whole province.

So also, when Pope Urban had to combat with Clement the Seventh, he was obliged to have recourse to the scheme of Saint Bernard. This is not wonderful: but it is wonderful, that, as soon as he published a Bull, promising a plenary remission of their Sins, and a place in Paradise, to all who sought in his cause, or contributed money to support it, our own nation slew up in arms; and, as an old Historian observes— As soon as these Bulls were published in England, land, the whole people were transported with joy, and thought that the opportunity of obtaining such inestimable graces was not to be neglected.' The representative of Saint Peter can no more issue such roaring - Bulls: tempora mutantur!

CHINESE PHYSICIANS.

THE Physicians of China, by feeling the arms of a fick man in three places; to obferve the flowness, the increase, or quick-. ness, of the pulse, can judge of the cause, the nature, the danger, and the duration, of his disorder. Without their patient's speaking, they reveal infallibly what part is affected. They are at once Doctors and Apothecaries, composing the remedies they prescribe. They are paid when they have compleated a cure; but they receive nothing when their remedies do not take effect. Our Physicians, it must be confessed, are by no means so skilful as the Chinese: but, in one thing, they have the advantage over them; which is, in taking their fees before they have performed the cure. And it is thus that Physicians, with little or no learning, ride in their chariots in London; while, in Pekin, they are very learned and walk on foot.

ÆTNA AND VESUVIUS.

It is very probable that Mount Vesuvius near Naples, and Mount Ætna in Sicily, form but different portions of one chain of Mountains that passes under the sea and the Isle of Lipari; for, whenever one of these Volcanos has a great eruption, it is observed, that the other, and the Volcano in the Isle of Lipari, throw out more slames than ordinary. This remark is made by Longuerue.

ROMAN ROADS.

THE magnificence of the Romans in their public edifices, infinitely surpassed that that of the last ages. The fole inspection of their roads is a most convincing proof. These Roads let out from the column executed in the middle of Rome, and entended themselves to the remotest borders of this vast Empire, for the convenience and the expedition of those Legions which had subjugated to many nations. These Roads, of which fome fill remain, were high, broad, folid, and in several places branched out into great founds, which the subverting hand of Time feeths yet to respect. Our Roady on the contrary, are in a variety of places in so pitiful a condition, that three or four days of min frequently interrupt the intercourse of commerce, and delay the journeys of the best equipages.

All this is lamentably true; we need bluffs at the Romans possessing more magnificent Roads than ourselves: we, who emulate them in all the ruin of their luxury; besides, they never paid so much Turnpike-money 22 we do.

LIGHT SUMMER SHOWERS FORMING BURNING MYRRORS.

In the Summer, after some days of fine weather, during the heat of the day, if a storm happens, accompanied with a few light showers of rain; and if the Sun appears immediately after with all it's usual arthour, it burns the foliage, and the flowers on which the rain had fallen, and destroys the hopes of the orchard. The burning heat, which the ardour of the Sun produces at that time on the leaves and flowers, is equal to the intense heat of burning Iron. Naturalists have sought for the cause of this strange effect, but they have said nothing which satisfies a reasonable mind. This is, however, the fact. In the serene days of the Summer, it is visible that there gathers on the foliage and the flowers, as, indeed, on every other part, a little dust, sometimes more and sometimes less, scattered by the When the rain falls on this dust, the drops drops mix together, and take an oval or round form, as we may frequently observe in our houses, on the dusty floor or cieling, when they scatter water before they sweep them. It is thus these globes of water, mingled on the foliage, form so many of those convex glasses which we call Burning Mirrors, and which produce the same effect. Should the rain be heavy and last long, the Sun would not then produce this burning heat, because the force and the duration of the rain, will have destroyed the dust which formed these drops of water; and these drops, losing their globular form, in which alone consisted their caustic power, will be dispersed without any extraordinary effect. For this observation, which, to the Naturalist must appear curious and novel, he is indebted to the ingenious Huet, Bishop of Avranches.

BLEEDING AND EVACUATION, TWO REMEDIES FOR LOVE.

HUET has a very singular observation on Love, which he exemplifies by an Anecdote as singular.

Love, he says, is not merely a passion of the soul, but it is also a disease of the body, like the Fever. It is frequently in the blood, and in the mind, which are terribly agitated; and, to be cured, it may be treated as methodically as any other disorder. Great Perspirations, and copious Bleedings, that carry away with the humour the instammable spirits, would purge the blood, calm the emotions, and replace every part in it's natural state.

The great Condé, having felt a violent passion for Mademoiselle de Vigean, was constrained to join the army. While his absence lasted, his passion was continually nourished by the tenderest recollections of Love, and by an intercourse of a continued correspondence, till the conclusion of the campaign, campaign, when a dangerous fickness brought him to the most imminent danger. To the violence of his illness, violent Remedies were applied; and every thing that was most essications in physic was given to the Prince. He regained his bealth, but he had lost his Love: the great Evacuations had carried away his passion; and when he thought himself a Lover, he found he had ceased to love.

On this Ancedote it is to be observed, that the sact is well authenticated; and; however the reader may seel himself inclined to turn Wit on this occasion, it's veracity cannot in the least be injured. But it must be confessed, that Evacuations may not always have on a despairing lover the same happy essect. 'When we would explain the mechanism of the human passions,' observes an ingenious writer, 'the observations must be multiplied.' This sact, then; does not tend to shew that the same remedies will cure every Lover, but that they did cure the Prince de Condé.

spairing swain, which will probably amuse the reader.

A German gentleman burned with an amorous flame for a German Princess. She was not insensible to a reciprocal passion; and to have him about her person, without giving scandal, she created him her General. They lived some time much pleased with each other; but the Princess became fickle, and the General grew jealous. He made very sharp remonstrances; and the Princess, who wished to be free, gave him his congé, and he was constrained to quit her. But his passion at every hour increased: he found he could not live out of her presence; and he ventured to enter imperceptibly into her cabinet. There he threw himself at her feet, and entreated her forgiveness. The Princess frowned, and condescended to give no other answer, than a command to withdraw from her Royal Highness's presence. The despairing lover exclaimed, that he was ready to obey her in every thing but that; that he was resolved, in this, to disobey her; and that he In faying preferred to die by her hand. Vol. I. Nn this, to give force to his eloquence, he presented his naked sword to the German Princess; who, perhaps, being little acquainted with the slowers of rhetoric, most cruelly took him at his word, and run him through the body. Fortunately his wound did not prove mortal: he was healed of the wound at the end of three months, and likewise of his passion, which had slowed away with the effusion of blood.

INFECTIOUS DISEASES.

THE present article, from the learned Bishop of Avranches, if not a valuable, forms at least an ingenious speculation.

Neither naturalists or physicians have informed us what is the cause which renders contagious so many diseases, while others are not in the least infectious. The gout, the gravel, the epilepsy, the apoplexy, are not caught by frequenting the company of the diseased; but the plague, the dysentery, the itch, the bloody-slux, occasion frequently terrible ravages by their infection. This is very probably the fact. It may be said, in general, that all contagious diseases produce worms,, which are contained in ulcers, puftules, or pimples, either internal or external, some less and some more, and of different kinds. We shall not here examine the cause of the production of these worms; but their effect is common and unvaried, and sometimes visible. It is also well known that these worms, by undergoing a revolution, which in them is natural, change into the fly state, and become gnats: this is done in a short time, and in infinite numbers. As soon as these flies, imperceptible by their diminutive fize, can lift themselves by their wings, they take their flight. They are then scattered abroad; and, entering the bodies of men by respiration, they infuse that poison by which they are engendered, and communicate that corruption from whence they have sprung.

It is thus great fires have been found very ferviceable in public contagions: kindled in divers places, they have, as many imagine, purified the air. The air is, indeed, purified, N n 2 but but not in the manner generally supposed, by rarifying and changing it's composition, but in burning and confuming these flying gnats with which the air is filled; and which, attracted by the light of the flames, mix with them, and are destroyed in the same manner as moths are by a candle. An opposite cause produces also the same effect; I mean, a sharp frost, that kills and destroys these terrible insects, if not entirely, at least the greater part: for it has been known, that so great have been their numbers, that many have escaped the rigours of the frost, and have continued the infection; as it happened some centuries back, in the dreadful plague, which desolated Denmark, and the neighbouring countries.

BABYLON, THEBES, AND NINEVEH.

Of the situation of these three greatest cities in the universe, of which history presents us with so many wonderful accounts, we are ignorant: there does not remain the slightest flightest vestige. The hundred gates of Thebes; the hanging gardens, and innumerable streets of Babylon; Nineveh (to use the expression of Scripture) 'that great city, in which were more than six score thousand persons;' are all melted away, 'like the baseless fabric of a vision.' They are, however, marked in maps.

AMBER-GRIS.

AMBER-GRIS is nothing else than boney, which abounds in the extensive mountains of the side of Ajan, melted by the heat of the sun; and which, falling into the sea, is condensed or petrified by the coldness of the water. The proof is, that very frequently bees are found inclosed in morsels of Amber-gris. This opinion is ingenious: it is given by the Abbé Longuerue; but the opinions of what Amber-gris is composed are so various, that, the sact is, we are ignorant of it.

THE PROMISES OF THE FAIR WRITTEN ON THE SEA SANDS.

THE following is a little adventure of Love, which is a great favourite with the Spanish nation, and wears something of an original air.

A fair-one, walking by the fea-fide, wrose with her finger on the fands.

Lates murte, que mudade. I mill die before I change.

He for whom these words were intended followed soon after. Having recognized the hand of the person whom he loved, his heart best with rapture at the marks the list of her sidelity and her constancy. But, while he was dwelling with pleasure on these delicious words, a wave from the sea rolled over and effected them. This occasioned our raptured lover to muse in another mode; and, however violent his passion might have been, he directly concluded, that it was not prudent to rely on things said by a woman.

and written on sand. George de Montemajor, a Spanish poet, has turned the thought into verse:

> Mira el amor lo que ordena, Que os viene a bazer creer, Cosas dichas por Muger, Y escritas en el Arena.

Which may be thus imitated—

The Lover, as he pleas'd surveys

The billet from his Fav'rite's hand, Believes the things a Woman says,
Believes the things she writes on sand.

A TRAVELLER'S SINGULARITIES.

BALTHAZAR GRATIAN, Author of the Courtier, has frequently very fingular strokes of imagination. In one of his works, he supposes his Hero to travel in search of a true Friend. Among the most singular curiosities he meets with in his travels, are to be distinguished the following ones—A poor Judge, with his wife, neither of whom had any singers to their hands; a great N n 4

Lord, without any debts; a Price action was never offended at the fitth being will him to his face; a Poet, who became the by the produce of his works; a Monarch, who died without any suspicion of having been poisoned; a humble Spaniard; a filent Frenchman; a lively Englishman; a German, who disliked wine; a learned Man recompensed; a chaste Widow; a Mandrew discontented; a fincere Female; and, what was more singular than all these singularities, a true Friend!

flanding jest: who does not know their purtiality to Cadwallader? Yet there are others which can disturb the muscles of the grands. Philosopher, and, perhaps, make the mairy. Charles the Fifth, and Louis the Thirteenth, have caused their Genealogies to reach to Adam. De Crouy, who married the heiress of the De Crouys in the time of Saint Louis, because he came from Hungary, resolved, if he brought nothing, at least to bring a Genealogy: and ventured to trace his descent from Attila, King of the Huns; who, it must be allowed, is a more regal ancestor than Adam himself.

Arthur Kelton, a miserable versifier, who wrote in the reign of Edward the Sixth, published, at the end of his Chronicle, a Genealogy of Brutes, in which the pedigree of our young monarch is lineally drawn through thirty-two generations, from Osiris, the first King of Egypt! Wood reproaches our author for his ignorance; but, as Warton observes, in an heraldic enquiry, so difficult and so new, many mistakes are pardonable.

In a book published in 1604, James the First has his genealogy derived from Noah. And William Slater more elaborately draws it from Adam.

To give the most splendid genealogy possible, I shall present the reader with that of Semiramis; with which Mr. T. Taylor, the modern Platonist, has favoured me. He is not a little delighted with the expressive grandeur of the names, and the sublimities of her pretensions. The Genealogy of Semiramis, Lynen of Bond bylon, as inscribed by ber on a Piller.

My Father was Jupiter Belus; my Grand-father Babylonic Saturn; my Great-grandfather

Great-grandfather's Grandfather

Coelus Phoenix Ogyges. From Ogyges to my his orb once and thirty hundred times.

From my Grandfather to my Father fix and fifty times. From my Father to me, twice and fixty times.

Semiramis in this mountain Olympus,

Dedicates to her Father-in-law Jupiter Belus, and to her Mother Rhea, This Column, Temple, and Statue.

The arms of modern families are, for the greater part (observes Menage) the figns of their ancient shops.

Fuller, in his Worthies of England, amongst amongst several exceptions which he supposes may be made to his work, has one very applicable to the present subject. In his Eighth Exception it is said, 'You, out of stattery, conceal the mean extraction of many (especially modern) men, who have attained to great preserment, pointing at the place of their birth, but suppressing their parentage.'

To this he answers—' I conceive myself to have done well in so doing. If enquiry be made into all men's descent, it would be found true what the poet doth observe—

Majorum primus quisquis fuit ille tuorum Aut pastor fuit, aut illud quod dicere nolo.

The first of all thine ancestors of yore,
Was but a shepherd, or——I say no more.*

SOLOMON AND SHEBA.

I RECOLLECT a pretty Story, which, in the Talmud or Gemara, some Rabbin has attributed to Solomon.

The power of this Monarch had spread his wisdom to the remotest parts of the known world. A private Scholar in general, passes his life in obscurity; and Posterity—a solitary consolation—spreads his name to the most distant regions. But when a King is a Student, the case is reversed. Queen Sheba, attracted by the splendour of his reputation, or, more probably, urged by the insatiable curiosity of the female, visited this poetical King at his own court, with the sole intention of asking bim questions. The Rabbin does not inform me, if her examination of the Monarch was always made in the chamber of audience; there is reason to suspect that they frequently retired, for the folution of many a hard problem, to the philosophic solitude of a private cabinet. But I do not intend by any means

scandal.'

It is sufficient, that the incident I now relate passed as Solomon sat surrounded by his court. At the foot of the throne flood the inquisitive Sheba; in each hand, the held a wreath of flowers; the one; composed of natural, the other, of artificial flowers. Art, in the labour of the mimic wreath, had exquisitely emulated the lively hues, and the variegated beauties of Nature; so that, at the distance it was held by the Queen for the inspection of the King, it was deemed impossible for him to decide—as her question imported—which wreath was the natural, and which the artificial. The fagacious Solomon-seemed posed; yet, to be vanquished, though in a trifle, by a trifling woman, irritated his pride. The son of David—he who had written treatifes on the vegetable productions ' from the cedar to. the hyssop,' to acknowledge himself outwitted by a woman, with shreds of papers and glazed paintings! The honour of the Monarch's Monarch's reputation for divine fagacity seemed diminished; and the whole Jewish court looked solemn and melancholy. At length, an expedient presented itself to the King; and, it must be confessed, worthy of the Natural Philosopher. Observing a cluster of Bees hovering about a window, he commanded that it should be opened: it was opened; the Bees rushed into the Court, and alighted immediately on one of the wreaths, while not a fingle one fixed on the other. The decision was not then difficult; the learned Rabbins shook their beards in rapture, and the baffled Sheba had one more reason to be assonished at the wisdom of Solomon.

This would make a pretty poetical Tale. It would yield an elegant description, and a pleasing moral; that the Bee only rests on the natural beauties, and never sixes on the painted slowers, however inimitably the co-lours may be laid on. This, applied to the Ladies, would give it pungency.

MISCELLANEA.

FRENCH AND SPANIARDS.

A LITTLE work, published after that famous intermarriage which overcame the enmity of the two Courts of France and Spain, though it could not that of the two nations, presents us with a humorous contrast of their manners, dispositions, habits, &cc.

- A Frenchman, fays our author, entering his friend's house, will immediately ask for some refreshment: a Spaniard would rather perish with hunger or thirst. A Frenchman salutes a lady by kissing her: a Spaniard, on presenting a lady his hand, will cover it with his cloak, and retreat back several paces to bow to her at a hundred steps distant.
- 'I have often been tempted,' says the author, who was a Spaniard, ' to ask the midwives if it was possible that a French child could be brought into the world in the same manner as a Spanish infant—so dissimilar they prove from their birth!
  - 'The French have a lively apprehension, hating hating idleness, and reducing turn knowledge into practical use; but they do not penetrate deeply into any matter. Spaniard, on the contrary, is fond of abftract and abstrule speculation, and dwells continually on an object. The French are afraid of believing too much; the other of believing too. tle. The former will difpatch the acis in the midst of noise and to mit, and the levity of affeinblies, or gainties of a table; whilft the grave Spaniard G bear the buzzing of a fly to difturb his fix attention. In love, the one is light and talkative; the other, constant and secret. The Spaniard will disguise his poverty er a thousand pretences, and invent as many fictions to perfuade you his appeara ce is owing to the necessity of concealing his person; whilst the Frenchman will press his wants upon you with the paoft, per vering importunity. In every minutia, this difference is traced; both at the toilette and table: in mixing wine, the Spaniard puts the water first in the glass; whilst the Frenchman puts the wine first. A troop of Frenchmen will walk abroast in the street wi abundance of tartle; whilft

MISCELLANEA.

whilst the Spaniards will walk with meafured gravity, in a defile, like a procession. A Frenchman, discovering a person at a distance, beckons with an uplisted hand, drawn towards his face: the Spaniard bends, his hand downwards, and moves it towards his feet.'

This contrast of humours and manners he seems inclined to attribute to the difference of climate: in the one country, settled and constant; in the other, ever varying, as the genius of it's inhabitants.

ATTIC PLEASANTRIES.

THE Bishop of Belley was a great Wit, and very happy in extemporaneous effusions; but his wit bears too frequently the alloy of puns and clenches. The following are neat—

'Après leur mort, les Papes deviennent des Papillons; les Sires des Cirons, et les Rois des Roitelets.'

For the satisfaction of those who are Vol. I. Oo pleased

- Le Maire d'une petite ville située sur le bord du Rhône sit ce compliment a un General des Armées du Roi en Piémont.
- ' Monseigneur, tandis que Louis le Grand fait aller l'Empire de mal en pire, damner le Dannemarc, suer la Suede; tandis que son digne rejetton fait baver les Bavarois, rend les troupes de Zelle, sans zele, et fait des essais aux Hessois; tandis que Luxembourg fait fleurir la France a Fleurus, met en flam-. me les Flamands, lie les Liegois, et fait danser la Castanaga sans castagnettes; tandis que le Turc hongre les Hongrois, fait esclaves les Esclavons, et reduit en servitude la Servie; enfin, tandis que Catinat demonte les Piémontois, que St. Ruth se rue sur les Savoyards; vous, Monseigneur, non content de faire sentir la pesanteur de vos doigts aux Vaudois; vous, faites encore la barbe aux Barbets, ce que nous oblige d'etre avec un profond respect, &c.'

Stephen Dolet was a Poet, a Printer, and a Grammarian. He had given very liberal strictures on religious matters, for which which he was imprisoned; and, not having kept his promise of turning a good Catholic, he was condemned to be burnt as an Atheist, at Paris, on the third of August 1546. As he proceeded to the place of execution, he observed the people commiserate his fate; on which he made this verse—

'Non dolet ipse Dolet, sed pia turba dolet.'

The Doctor who accompanied him an fivered—

'Non pia turba dolet, sed dolet ipse DOLET.'

Among the many puerile amusements which Fashion has frequently sanctioned, there was one which merits to be distinguished. It was the contrivance of arranging letters and words, apparently without signification, so as to form a perfect sentence in the pronunciation. Among the most tolerable of these was the following one, chosen as the device of one who had thrown off the yoke of an unworthy mistress—

J, A, C, O, B, I, A, L;

which letters, pronounced in the French language, have this compleat fignification—

J'ai, ossez obei à Elle.

Something similar has been lately given by the ingenious Harry Erskine, who inferibed on his Tea-Chest the following Latin words—

These, however inapplicable they may appear, when translated into our vernacular tongue, run thus—

The second person singular of the verb docere making a very neat pun of the substantive Tea-Chest.

Fuller,

Fuller, ridiculously quaint, observes of Shakespeare, that he resembled Martial. The reader is curious, perhaps, to know in what respect:—it is in the warlike nature of his name; as Shake-speare, like Martial, relates to war.

A rich grocer had retired from his shop, and had written under one of his devotional pictures, in his country feat, the Latin motto-

A French wag erased the initial R and the final m, to remind him of his origin; and there very appositely remained

It is a pleasantry perfectly characteristic of that vulgar fanatic, Hugh Peters; when, in a print prefixed to his life, he is reprefented in the pulpit, amidst a full congregation; while he is turning an hour-glass; near aim are these words— I know you are good fellows; stay, and take the other glass."

When the French King lay in imminent danger, every corporation attended prayers daily for the benefit of his majesty's health. It was to this custom an academician (somewhat too facetious for a serious eulogium on the king) alluded, when he said, 'The merchant quits his business, to bend at the foot of the altar; the artisan leaves his work unfinished; the physician quits his patient; and the parient is all the better for it.'

It was the literary humour of a certain Mccenas, who frequently added to the luftre of his patronage the chearful steams of a good dinner, to place his guests according to the size and thickness of the books they had printed. At the head of the table, in the most honourable places, sat those who had published volumes in folio, folissimo; next the authors in quarto; then those in oftwo. *——This was not a fair estimate: Blackmore would have had at that table the precedence of Gray. It is a fine remark of Gresset—

Dr. Granger supplies me with two curious puns. Hobbes was much pleased with the following epitaph, which was made for him, to be engraven on his tomb-stone:

PHILOLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS.

THE MOTHER TONGUES.

SCALIGER observes, there are four Mother, or radical, Tong es in Europe. Theos, the Greek; Deus, the Latin, the French, the Italian, and the Spanish. Got, the Danish, the English, the German, the Dutch, and the Flemish. Goii, the Sclavonian. There are six lesser or inferior languages, independent of the above four. The Bask, the low Breton, the Hungarian, the Irish, the Swedish, and the Tartarian. The Welch language must also be distinguished; though it bears so great an assimity to the low Bre-ton, that, it is said, these nations understand each other with little difficulty. The Irish and the Danes once spoke the same language. The Bask is the ancient Spanish, as the Cantabrians spoke it in the time of the Romans.

THE LATIN TONGUE.

THE fate of the Latin Tongue may be divided into fix Ages. The Barbarous and Uncultivated Age; the Middle Age; the Golden, the Silver, the Brass, and the Iron Ages.

The Barbarous Age lasted from four to five hundred years; from Romulus, in whose reign more Greek than Latin was spoken, till Livius Andronicus, the first who caused plays to be acted at Rome.

The Middle Age extends itself from Andronicus till the days of Cicero. During this interval of time many authors began to write the Latin language. The most distinguished are, Ennius, Nævius, Plautus, Terence, and Lucretius. The poem of the last last writer does so much honour to this age, that, we must candidly acknowledge, it would not be unworthy even of the Golden Age of pure Latinity, were it somewhat less obscure.

The Golden Age of the Latin language began in the time of Cicero, and finished with the reign of Augustus; so that, without a metaphor, it is but an Age. Then flour thed Varro, Cicero, Julius Cæsar, Cornelius Nepos, Virgil, Horace, Ovid, Severus Albinovanus, Sallust, and others; a part of whose works have happily escaped the ravages of Time.

The Silver Age, which commences at the death of Augustus, and terminates with Antonine the Pious, was very fruitful in excellent compositions; but it's language began to lose somewhat of it's richness and it's purity, in spite of the indefatigable Quintilian, who vainly attempted to revive the Golden Age. Seneca, whose style is one continued affectation, who is for ever on the stretch to catch points, antithesis, and other trivial sports of the mind, enervates manly sentiment, and shocks a correct taste. It was him who corrupted the Latin language.

The

The Age of Brass commences from the reign of Antoninus, and reaches till Honorius, under whose reign the invasions of the Barbarians took place. Besides profane authors, who abound in this age, it produced Tertullian, Arnobius, Lactantius, Cyprian, Saint Hilary, Prudentius, Ambrose, Jerome, Augustin, Damases, and Sulpicius Severus.

The irruptions of the Barbarians occasioned an Age of Iron to the Latin language. Who has not heard declamations against the Goths and Vandals? This dreadful epoch lasted from six to seven ages. During this time some authors, however, arose, who have done honour to the Latin tongue; but it must be recollected, that the ignorance of these times was so deplorable, that our great Alfred complains, that in England it was difficult to find a priest who could read; and the Historian of Universal History must record, that the knowledge of the Ecclesiastics consisted only in some very barbarous Latin.

Several learned men, says Charpentier, have written, that the pronunciation of the Latin is very different to what it was anciently. That the Romans distinguished the short short i from the long i; that they pronounced the c in the word dicit, as in dico; that in artium they articulated the t as in arti; and that the u had the sound of w. According to this mode of pronunciation, these lines of Latin—

Utinam Ciceronem audivissemus, Romani, ut prononciaremus voces vestras ut decet,

Whotinam Kikeronèm audiwissemoos Romani; oot pronon-kiaremoos vokes westras oot deket.

All this may be the effect of a learned fancy. It is, however, certain, that every nation pronounce the Latin differently, and give it the accent of their maternal tongue. The Bavarians say poter, for pater; the Polands pronounce quamfam, for quamquam; agfa, for aqua. And the French smile at us, because we pronounce canis according to our national accent. We may take our revenge; for they pronounce it according to their own.

Aldus Manutius composed the first Latin Grammar. It was printed at Paris in 1500. The Method of the Port Royal is the first which which freed itself from the bondage of prescribing rules in Latin, to learn the Latin language.

The Latin language is ranked amongst those they call dead, because they are no more the languages the vulgar of any nation speak; and, being regulated by the ancient authors, custom can no more tyrannize over them. But it may be said, in a figurative sense, that they are living ones, by the constant use the Learned make of them; and it may not be improper to call them the Languages of the Land of Science.

THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

I HAVE extracted from two Authors of a distant interval of time—since one is honest Peter Heylin, who wrote in the days of our first Charles; and the other, Mr. Sheridan, whose Lectures are well known—the present article concerning that language, which it becomes us not so much to enlarge as to preserve.

l'eter Heylin thus observes in his Cosmography graphy—' The English language is a decompound of Dutch, French, and Latin, which I conceive rather to add to it's perfection, than to detract any thing from the worth thereof, since out of every language we have culled the most significant words, and equally participate in that which is excellent in them: their imperfections being rejected; for it is neither so boisterous as the Dutch, nor so effeminate as the French, yet as significant as the Latin; and, in the happy conjunction of two words into one, little inferior to the Greek.'

Mr. Sheridan thus ingeniously has written on the same topic—' Upon a fair comparison, it will appear that the French have emasculated their tongue, by rejecting such numbers of their consonants; and made it resemble one of their painted Courtexans, adorned with fripperies and fallals. That the German, by abounding too much in harsh Consonants and Gutturals, has great size and strength, like the statue of Hercules Farnese, but no grace. That the Roman, like the built of Antinous, is beautiful indeed but not manly. That the Italian has beauty, grace, grace, and symmetry, like the Venus of Medicis, but is feminine; and that the English alone retembles the ancient Greek, in uniting the three powers, of strength, beauty, and grace, like the Apollo of Belvedere.

I contemplate with great pleasure the classical statue which is here offered to the imagination. When I recollect the sweetness of Addison, the strength of Johnson, and the grace of Melmoth, I rise into enthusiasm, and exult in the conviction that the English is the most perfect of the European languages. The embarrassed periods of Hooker, Raleigh, and Clarendon, will no more languish on the ear. We have polished the solid marble of our ancestors. With strength, to which we have no pretentions, they have extracted it from the quarry; but we are the artificers who, with the dexterous use of the file, can smooth their asperities, can arrange into elegance, and can heighten into lustre. No more shall some future Waller sing, that he who employs the English language, writes his verses on fand; and that, to endure to posterity, he must carve in the marble of Latin and Greek.

The

The Golden Age of the English language, however, seems approaching to it's first state. Nothing contributes so much to corrupt it's purity as an inundation of French translations, rather than translations from the French. The avarice of some, and the hunger of others, are continually pouring on us whole volumes, disfigured with Gallicisms; and, not infrequently, whole sentences in French are aukwardly introduced as improvements, doubtless, to supply the deficiences of the English language, or rather those of the translator.

Yet, it must be confessed, there are some few French words which, with great felicity, express a sense of which we have no exact or parallel expressions. We may, indeed, make use of phrases which may serve tolerably. well to explain our meaning; but the delicacy of expression seems to be lost.

The ingenious Vigneul Marville has ventured to censure our language. Perhaps, he was no competent judge of it's demerits; at least, his criticism is too often more sprightly than sound. But we must confess, that it is now a century fince he flourished;

Yol. I. Pp and, if we reflect on the state of our language in his day, it will not be found totally unjust.

The style of the English writers is long and embarrassed, very difficult to translate into Latin, into French, or into Italian. We must recollect this when we read the works of the English Authors in their own language with an intention to translate them. Perhaps, the English would bear better to be translated into Spanish than into French, as the French is more happily rendered into Greek than into Latin. The Italian will find no language which, without injuring it's delicacies and it's diminutives, can afford a version. The German language is well enough adapted to the Latin.

The reader may be pleased, probably, to hear an ingenious Frenchman writing on our language, thus express himself—

He who loves the sciences, should not negical the English language. If he would become acquainted with those excellent productions which breathe the warmest spirit of liberty, let him give his studies to this language. Sir Richard Steele, so celebrated for his other compositions, has given us a good Grammar, accompanied with excellent Notes. The Grammar of Dr. Wallis is only proper for those who are conversant with the Latin.

Perhaps, the above-mentioned Grammar is quite forgotten. I have in my possession A Grammar of the English Tongue, with Notes, giving the Grounds and Reason of Grammar in general, printed for John Brightland, 1711. To which is prefixed, The Approbation of Isaa Bickerstaff, Esq;' who, I suppose, is Sir Richard Steele, dressed out in masquerade. He says, 'that this Grammar of the English Tongue has done that justice to our language which, till now, it never obtained. The Text will improve the most ignorant, and the Notes employ the most learned. I therefore enjoin all my female correspondents to buy, read, and study, this Grammar, that their letters may be something less enigmatic, &c.' is dedicated to Queen Anne. The Notes are copious, and by no means trifling; they are not unworthy of accompanying Lowth's Grammar.

THE DUTCH AND GERMAN LANGUAGES.

THE knowledge of these two languages is more useful to travellers and merchants than to men of letters. These two languages are disagreeable in their words and their pronunciation; nor is their manner of expression clear. Neither the Dutch or the Germans make use of that easy phraseology which simply follows the connexion of our ideas, which joins naturally word with word, according to their different fignifications: they imitate rather the figurative turn of the Latin, in those inversions of phrase which hold the mind in suspense till the close of the sentence. They bear so strong an affinity to each other, that it is easy for one, who is conversant with either, to know the other. The Dutch is hardly any thing else than the old German. The found of the German language is more full and more agreeable than the Dutch.

CHARACTER OF THE FRENCH, THE SPA-NISH, AND THE ITALIAN LANGUAGES.

THERE is this difference between these three languages. 'The Italian owes much of it's merit and it's softness to it's peculiar. turn of phrase, and the manner in which it employs it's diminutives: thus it expresses, with great felicity, the sentiments of Love. The Spanish draws all it's nobleness, and it's pomp, from gigantic expressions and hyperboles, of which no other language will admit. The French appears to hold a middle rank between these two languages: it can express with strength and vivacity, the language of reason, by representing things as they are; it is thus well calculated for the compositions of History, Controversy, Theology, and Philosophy. It seems, however, to be very unfortunate in it's poetical productions: the French are hardly aware of it themselves; but there is no correct ear that has been accustomed to English versification, that can bear, with any degree of patience, it's tiresome monotony. A French poet, who was as great an admirer of Latin verses as of wine, compares French versification to the drinking of water. It's satiric verse, however, has the preference.

The Italian, of all the European languages, after the French, is the most general in use. The facility with which it is acquired, is one great cause of it's universality. Yet it must be remarked, that if it is attained in some tolerable degree with so much ease, it is, indeed, difficult to grow conversant with all it's delicacies, or to write or. speak it to perfection. Those who wish to be informed of the best authors who have written in this language, should consult the ' Reggionamento della Eloquenza Italiana,' of the Abbé Fontanini, corrected and illustrated by the Notes of Apostolo Zeno, printed in two volumes, quarto, at Venice, 1753. A work, that bears for it's title— 'The Italian Library; containing an Account of the Lives and Works of the most valuable Authors of Italy, by Giuseppe Baretti,' printed for Millar, 1757—is very useful for one who wishes to recognize the numerous authors who have written in this polito

The criticisms are amusive and bold, in the manner of Baretti; whose pages, it must be confessed, whatever might be his errors as a man, or as an author, seldom; were sound to weary the reader.

THE PRENCH LANGUAGE.

MR. Valois has given the following critical history of the French Language, which may gratify the philologist.

The French language, as now in use, derives it's origin from the Latin, or the Roman language corrupted; as do also the Italian and the Spanish: it is mixed with German, and even Gaulish words. Anciently, they called Rustic Roman (as may be seen by the Acts of the Council of Tours, of the year 813) that language which the Gauls, in that time comprehended under the name of Romans, employed, as well as the greater part of the French, Normans, and chiefly the people of Aquitaine and Languedoc. The earliest example which we have of this language called Rustic Roman, is in Nitard, book III, who gives the oath of Louis, King of Germany, and the treaty which he made with King Charles. We read in Fauchet, that the poets only began to make use of this language about the year 1150. We do not find, or at least rarely, Patent Letters of the Kings of France, Edicts, or Declarations in this language, till about 1220. The laws which William the Conqueror gave to the English nation, and which yet exist, are in the Rustic language, from whence the French is derived.

Abbé Longuerue observes on his language, that the progress it made from 1630 to 1670 was astonishing. Pelisson, in his Panegyric on Louis XIV. says, that it was at it's persection:—he was a prophet. Augustus, who had seen the Latin language at it's acmé, saw the commencement of it's decline: this happened to Louis XIV. While Racine lived, he did all he possibly could to bring back the Academy to the style of D'Ablancourt and Patru, in declaring that they were our masters; but his trouble was lost. A corrupt taste has prevailed since his death, more than before.

An Englishman who admires the brilliancy and the vivacity of French prose, who is delighted with the lively fallies of Voltaire, enchanted with the picturesque diction of Rousseau, and who is familiar with all the graces, and all the delicacies, of that elegant crowd of fine writers of which the French have just reason to exult, cannot but attribute such complaints to that fastidiousness of criticism, which will always exist to chastise and mortify the great writers of the age. The French critics, however, say, that the celebrated authors about the time of Louis XIV. displayed and respected more the true taste of the ancients; but that the moderns have facrificed every thing to the bel esprit; a term difficult to render into English.

LANGUAGE,

THERE is not, observes a spirited French writer, any language which may be deemed compleat; any that can express all our ideas, and all our sensations; their shades are imperceptible, and too numerous. No one can precisely reveal the degree of sensation which he seels. We are constrained, for instance, to describe, under the general name of Love and Hate, all their variety of passion. It is thus also of our Griefs and Pleasures; so that all languages but impersectly express the sensations of man.

THE LIVING LANGUAGE.

THERE is no Living language in Europe which is older than five hundred years. If we hope for immortality, we must write in Latin; but then we shall find no readers, Chaucer, Gower, Lydgate, and an infinite number of excellent writers, have fallen martyrs to their patriotism, by writing in their mother tongue. Spenser is not always intelligible without a glossary; and when Shakespeare's Rape of Lucrece was republished, a few years after his death, his editor thought proper to explain certain expressions which had then become obsolete.

· The

The Living languages, fays Monago, are more difficult to acquire than the Deader It is now fifty years I have laboured on my own: and I must confess I am far from having attained perfection. To know and to write excellently our mother tongue, one must be acquainted with the ancient languages, even more than with the modern. The greater part of languages are closely connected by one chain. The Differtation of Pere Besnier, a Jesuit, on this subject, ia very curious. He formed a project for the re-union of languages, or the art of learning them all by a fingle one. This plan may be feen in a little book, printed at Liege, by Nicholas le Baragoin, 1674.

"He should have continued approjectules pleasing and so useful. His abilities, were adequate to the task; but, unfortunately, he had not the leisure to apply himself."

If this plan is valuable, which it appears to be by the account of two critical French writers, who must be allowed to be able judges of this subject, let some student, who burns with the ambition of rendering an important service, not alone to his country, but to manking, eternize his name, by devoting his life to an undertaking which will place his memory—

4 Above all Roman, and all Grecian fame."

Bayle has made some observations on the Living languages which merit our attention. He blames that false delicacy which every day is impoverishing the language, by discarding words, which otherwise are excellent, merely because they are old. This inconstancy of the Living languages introduces such numerous affectations and puerilities in style. Those words which are continually banished, are frequently convenient, and serve to vary our expressions. He says, that it is generally two kinds of authors who countenance this (what I think may be called) persecution of words: these are young authors, and those who compose a little pamphlet every four or five years. A young author, who only reads the new productions, conceives that the expressions and the words he gathers from them can alone form a fine style. And he who composes half a page per diem, has not the opportunity to know the want of a number of expressions, which a more assiduous writer is continually feeling.

feeling. Both these kinds of writers form their judgment of composition by the novelties of their times; and pride themselves on the delicacy of their taste, when they censure any expression which was thought good not many years back. Had they to compose (observes our experienced writer) a work of length, and that too not flowly. they would not affect to dislike expressions, which, though old, might be very good. The difficulties of the work, the embarrassment of repetitions, the danger of rhiming in prose, unless one is careful; all these, with many other reasons, might convince them of the evil they do to authors, by im= poverishing the language they employ.

ARABIC.

'IT is aftonishing,' exclaims Longuerue, through what an extent of countries the Arabic language is spoken, from Bagdad to the Cape of Good Hope.'

I find, in the Matanafiana, page 171, the following criticism on this language. Besides Postel, and other Maronites of Mount Libanus, who have laboured on the Arabic Grammar, Thomas Erpenius has composed it's Rudiments, which appeared in 1620; and some time afterwards, a Grammar, by Jean Maire, printed at Leyden in 1636, to which are appended the sables of Lockman.
The Arabic language is intelligent and energetic. It is full of graceful turns, and sigurative expressions, which give it great elevation

elevation and strength. It is harmonious; and it's good Authors increase it's natural harmony by the care they take in their profaic compositions, to vary their periods, and to introduce a cadence which has all the melody of verse. The book the best written in this language, is the Alcoran.

Sallengre, the author of the Matanasiana, says, that the Arabic has many words in common with the French'; such as, valet, acheter, magazin, chemise. In the account of the Persian language, I have given a conjecture of Huet, to explain the cause of it's having similar words with the German; but have not hitherto sound any philological conjecture which accounts for the present instance.—Does it arise from any intercourse which the French have had formerly, particularly during the Croisades?

Cardinal Perron says, that the Arabic language is not only very sonorous; but, perhaps, the richest and the most fertile we know. It is also very useful for the explanation of many passages of Scripture.

THE HEBREW!

ALMOST all those writers who have treated on the Hebrew language, would fain persuade its, that it is the first that men have fpoken: but-what is more impertinent in them they have the affurance to inform us that it is the language of God himfelf; nor is this opinion by any means novel, fince Saint Gregory of Nyssa has; even in his life-time, reprobated the idea, and calls it a folly, and a ridiculous vanity of the Jews & as if God himfelf, he fays, had been a mafter of Grammar. La Motte le Vayer writes in his Letters, that the most partial partizans which ever the Hebrew has had; must confeis, that excepting the inferior languages, fuch as the Bafk and the Breton, &c. there is not among the living or the dead languages, any which do not prefent us with more valuable compositions than the Hebrew does, if we except the Old Testament: He adds, that we can well do without making use of a barbarous jargon, that never repays us for Vol. I.

The Hebrew Grammars which the Christians have composed, are infinitely more persect than those of the Jews. Their knowledge in the writings of their Rabbins is not inserior; and to this they have added a clear and regular method, which is very necessary in a language whose idioms and modes of expression the great distance of time has so obscured, that it is almost impossible to attain to any persect knowledge, or to decide with any degree of certainty concerning it.

Buxtorf, the father, has surpassed all those who have devoted their studies to this language; and later writers have done little more than copying or abridging his book. It is intituled—'J. Buxtorsii Thesaurus Grammaticus linguæ Sanctæ Hebræ duobus libris methodice propositus, &c.'

We may add, that the Hebrew has no other difference between the Syriac and the Chaldee, if we except the characters, than that which exists between the Latin and the Italian.

Scaliger observes, that the beginnings of the Hebrew do not threaten us with much trouble; but, as we proceed, we find inexpressible difficulties; which; he says, is the contrary with the Greek language. Gebelin; in his monde primitif, is of opinion with other learned men, that the Hebrew is not the primitive language. His reasons for this opinion, are numerous and just. I refer the curious philologer to that work; which abounds with valuable information.

The ingenious Mr. Rigoley de Juvigny writes thus, in his commentary on Les Bibliotheques francoises of De la Croix de la Maine, and Du Verdier- No language of the ancient nations subsists: they are all buried in the night of Time. The Jews themfelves, after their long captivity at Babylon, forgot their own language, and learnt the Chaldaic; the genius of which was nearly the fame with that of the Hebrew. that time, the holy writings are found amongst the Jews in Chaldaic letters. They then formed a Greek mixed with Hebraism's. which is called, the Hellenistic language: the version of the Seventy is in this language. The Samaritans only preserved the Pentateuch in the ancient Hebrew characters. As to what relates to us, the holy writings have been transmitted to us in Greek, or in Latin: the only languages the Church adopted.'

It was the absurd opinion of one Father Thomassin, who was a genuine bigot, that, as every thing originates from Adam, so every language proceeds from the Hebrew. Thus the Chinese, Persian, French, and English, and generally all other languages, come from the Hebrew, as clearly as the light comes from the sun!

We must not be surprized, if the Hebrew literature is only worth the attention of those who are fond of Biblical criticism. It was a maxim with the Israelites, as well as it is one with the Mahometans, that their Bible was the only book they should read. Like Peter's loaf, or their own manna, it contained the taste of every thing they wished. The modern Jews preserve, with admirable rigour, this maxim of their ancestors; and they read no other book except their Bible, and their Manuscripts; I mean, their Ledgers.

OF THE SAMARITAN, CHALDAIC, SY-RIAC, ETHIOPIAN, PERSIAN, ARME-NIAN, TARTARIAN, AND CHINESE LANGUAGES.

THE greater part of these languages, and the Arabic itself, are dialects of the Hebrew; and some so closely resemble it, that the difference is hardly perceivable. Such are, for instance, the Samaritan, the Chaldee, and the Syriac. Hottinger shews, in his Chaldaic Grammar, the affinity the Hebrew bears to the Chaldee, the Syriac, and the Arabic. The Jews brought the Chaldee from Babylon. The books of Daniel and Esdras are for the greater part written in this language. It was the Syriac Jefus Christ and the Apostles spoke; and a knowledge of this language is very necessary for a perfect understanding of the New Testament.

Ludolphus has given us a Grammar of the Ethiopian language. This language has Qq3 a great a great mixture of Hebrew, Chaldee, and Arabic words. It has a distinct and peculiar character; and, in writing it, the vowel points are not marked according to the custom of the Hebrews, the Arabs, the Chaldeans, and the Syrians; but every letter is a syllable, being at once composed of a vowel and a consonant.

One Louis de Dieu has given a Persian Grammar; but Mr. Richardson has lately published a Dictionary, which is said to be a very valuable labour. Our nation has of late made such a progress in this study, that we may expect, when it shall become more universal, to receive not only Grammars and Dictionaries, but to partake in it's original compositions. Sir William Jones, whose learning is great, and whose genius is equal to his learning, has already laid the literary world under great obligations for some curious prose and some enchanting verse. Scaliger observes, that the Persian language is very beautiful, and is expressed in few words. It bears no analogy with the Hebrew; but, what is surprizing, it does with the German; having many words in common, as Father, Brother, Sifter, and other fimilar ones. How are we to account for this?

Since this article has been printed, I have found a conjecture in Huet to folve this fingular difficulty. Like all his conjectures, it displays not less admirable ingenuity than profound erudition.

It is observed, he says, that the German language bears a great affinity with the Perfian, whether it be for it's inflexions or for it's terms. The cause of this conformity may be attributed to their common origin, which is from the Scytbians. The Indians, who came from the same source, and whom the ancients called Indo Scythians, retained much of the same language; and we find, in the modern language of the Persians, those Indian terms which Ctesias has preferved. But the Medes formerly sent colonies into Germany. Is not this most probably the cause of this conformity?

A Tartarian Grammar has been given by Thevenot; and, by Abbé Bignon, a Chinese. I do not know if we have Grammars of these languages.

Of all the languages of Asia, there are Qq4 none none which merit our attention more than the Chinese and the Persian; for the arts and sciences have long and successfully been cultivated by these people. The following article affords some curious information concerning the Chinese language.

THE CHINESE LANGUAGE.

From the Twenty-ninth volume of the Lettres Edifiantes et Curieuses I take the present critically humorous account of this language.

P. Bourgeois, one of the missionaries, attempted, after ten months residence at Pekin, to preach in the Chinese language. These are the words of the good father. God knows how much this first Chinese sermon cost me! I can assure you, this language resembles no other. The same word has never but one termination; and then adieu to all, that in our declensions, distinguishes the gender, and the number of things we would speak; adieu, in the verbs, to all which might explain the active person, how and in what time it acts, if it acts alone or with others: in a word with the Chinese, the same word is substantive, adjective, verh, singular, plural, masculine, seminine, &c. It is the person who hears who must arrange the circumstances, and guess them. Add to all this, that all the words of this language are reduced to three hundred and a few more; that they are pronounced in so many different ways, that they fignify eighty thousand different things, which are expresfed by as many different characters. This is not all: the arrangement of all these monosyllables appears to be under no general rule; so that to know the language, after having learnt the words, we must learn every particular phrase: the least inversion would make you unintelligible to three parts of the Chinese.

'I will give you an example of their words. They told me chou signifies a book: so that I thought whenever the word chou was pronounced, a book was the subject. Not at all! Chou, the next time I heard it, I sound signified a tree. Now I was to recollect, chou was a book, or a tree. But this amounted to nothing: chou, I sound, expressed expressed also great beats; chen is to relate; chou is the Aurora; chou means to be accustomed; chou expresses the loss of a wager, &c. I should not finish, were I to attempt to give you all it's significations.

· Notwithstanding these singular difficulties, could one but find a help in the perusal of their books, I should not complain. But this is impossible! Their language is quite different from that of simple conversation. What will ever be an insurmountable difficulty to every European, is the pronunciation: every word may be pronounced in five different tones; yet every tone is not so distinct that an unpractised ear can easily distinguish it. These monosyllables fly with amazing rapidity; then they are continually disguised by elisions, which sometimes hardly leave any thing of two monosyllables. From an aspirated tone, you must pass immediately to an even one; from a whistling note to an inward one; sometimes your voice must proceed from the palate; sometimes it must be guttural, and almost always nasal. I recited my sermon at least fifty times to my servant, before I spoke it in public: and yet, I am told, though he continually continually corrected me, that, of the tea parts of the fermon, (as the Chinese express themselves) they hardly understood three, Fortunately, the Chinese are wonderfully patient; and that they are assonished that any ignorant stranger should be able to learn two words of their language.'

ON THE USE OF THE PAGAN MYTHOLOGY IN POETRY.

A REVOLUTION has taken place in modern Poetry, which is of the greatest importance to the lovers of the art. This is no less than a total banishment of the Heathen Mythology from our Poetry. The great Johnson preferring, not infrequently, a fingularity of opinion to an enforcing of truth -or, let us confess, who has given strong marks of a deficiency in poetical taste-has confounded the beauties of the Pagan Mythology with it's abuse. We are to read the criticisms of this great man with caution; we must recollect that, in his examination of Milton, his prejudices warp his judgment; and,

and, in his animadversions on Gray, his criticisms were uncandid and unpoetical. He tells us, in his Life of Prior, 'That his sictions are mythological, and that they are surely despicable:' for he adds—'By the help of such easy sictions, and vulgar topics, without acquaintance with life, and without knowledge of art or nature, a poem of any length, cold and lifeless like this, may be easily written on any subject.'

This is dictated by the uncharitable spirit of criticisin. It is strange, that a man of such active faculties, and of such critical sagacity, should not have perceived, that when the Poet wanders in the unbounded regions of Fancy, he hath little to do with the mere state of Nature; that, expatiating in the wide range of Imagination, he does not so much borrow from Nature, but rather adorns her by the creation of new beings. Hence the pipe of the shepherd is the shrill shell of Pan; the murmuring of the waters is the sigh of the Naiad; and the dewy slowers, that sparkle on the eye, are the glittering tears of Aurora.

I will allow that a Pedant, well read in his Pantheon, may produce, what some may be apt to take for a Poem, by a mere mechanical effort. He may call Apollo and the Muses, Minerva and Venus; but let him beware of what he is about. celestial beings are no less dangerous than what, in our British Solomon's time, was thought to be the raising of the devil; of whom one faid, that he doubted not, with book in hand, he could raise him easily enough; but, when he had done that, the danger lay in the manner he was to employ his devilship. The Pedant may, indeed, drag into his verse the reluctant gods and goddesses; but they will not have the air of divinities. It requires the most skilful hand, and some of the finest touches of genius, to place them in a novel fituation; to polifh' the finished piece into classical beauty, and exhaust on them the pomp and brilliancy of his imagination.

Let us not, then, hastily resign our faith, in the theology of ancient Poetry. If it appears trite and insipid in the hands of a mere versisier, let us reslect, that every thing in such a writer will have the same effect. It is certain, that no order of beings have yet been found so agreeable to the imagination, gination, when this poetic machinery is difplayed by the address of superior genius. How admirably has Gray, in his Progress of Poetry, embellished with these beautiful forms the third stanza of the first Antistrophe. Allegorical Personages, which *Spen*fer has unfortunately employed, soon weary. The enchantment of mythological siction is continued, and is susceptible of continual variety.

The omnipotence of the divinities of Poetry is eternal: it is true, they do not always yield their inspiration. Venus still resides in Paphos; Diana still embellishes the woods; the Nymphs inhabit their accustomed oak; and there is not a pure stream but, in it's crystaline cave, is still honoured with the presence of it's Naiad.

I venerate the abilities of this our late Coryphæus; but, if we are blindly to follow the dictum of our leader, farewel to that free discussion by which, through the medium of contrary opinions, we at length attain to truth. The critical powers of Boileau may well be opposed to those of Johnson; and however the English dress, which Sir William Soame has given him,

ON THE POETRY OF BARON HALLERS

IT was once the intention of the Editor to have presented a translation of the Poetry of Baron Haller to the Public.

The Poet, whom I am now going to in8 troduce troduce to the reader, is better known in this country for his extensive learning, and recondite labours in physiology, than for those exquisite pieces which place him so conspicuously amongst the modern Poets of Germany.

If England has not bestowed on him the honours of a Poet, France, however, has not been backward in this respect. His Poetry has been elegantly translated, and multiplied by repeated editions. There are those who have placed him on an equality with the celebrated Gesner: and, perhaps, he is only not equal to him in not having produced a Poem of the magnitude of his Death of Abel.

If it is allowed me to give the character of Haller as a Poet, I will say, that he does not swell into that turgid eloquence, which wearies the mental eye by a cumbrous accumulation of splendour. It is the characteristic of the German Poets, that they do not know when to stop; the strength of their genius transports them into obscurity: by soaring too high, they strain the temperate eye of the Critics; judgment to them is a silken filken string, too feeble to chain the wing of an eagle.

I do not mean, however, to countenance or excuse certain pieces which, they inform us, are translations from the German; and which, indeed, may well disgust the world with all German Poetry. But, I believe that the bombast of these writers is rather to be attributed to themselves, than to the unfortunate German; who, certainly, had he originally written in so aukward a style, would not have been thought worthy of a translation.

Haller is beautiful in his descriptions, sublime in his Odes, and tender in his Elegies. He is not less to be admired as a Satirist; and Berne once trembled at the presence of it's Juvenal. His numbers are highly polished; and it is hard to render justice to the delicate language of his Muse.

The following Poem is not partially chosen, but for it's convenient length. There is an elegant simplicity, added to a closeness of thought; which, if it does not always wear the fantastic air of novelty, impresses in the feeling heart that philosophical consolation worthy of the genius of Haller.

When shall I lay my-self on the declivity of those little hills which Nature hath spread with green carpets of moss, where nought is heard save the trembling leaves, agitated by the vernal airs, or the murmurs of a little brook that refreshes those solitary meads.

O Heaven! when wilt thou permit me to visit, once more, those vales where I passed the spring of my life; where, often to the murmurs of a falling cascade, my verse flowed in honour of my Sylvia; while the caresses of Zephyr, animating the grove, threw on my pensive soul a soft melancholy. There, every care was banished, while I sat in the umbrageous depth of those woods whose boughs were impenetrable to the beams of the sun.

- 'Here, continually, have I to combat with my forrows: my mind is oppressed with grief for ever renewed; and I know not the sweetness of tranquillity and joy. Far from the country where first I sprung into life: without parents, a stranger to all the world, abandoned to the ardours of youth, I find myself in possession of a dangerous liberty, without having learnt how to conduct myself.
- Now disease shoots through my languishing frame, and stirles even the wish for glory, and for science! Now my disappointed hopes droop in the despondence of discouragement and grief: while the sea throws itself on the ruins of broken dykes, and brings it's waves and death to our gates; and and Mars threatens us with the flames of war which kindle from the ashes *.

- But let us embrace comfort. All must terminate! The storm is weakened at each gust it blows. Past evils teach us to enjoy the present good. Who is a stranger to adversity, is alike a stranger to pleasure. Time, who, with his rapid wing, hath brought my affliction, conducts also my felicity. I may yet inhale the purer air of my native hills!
- Ah! may I soon rejoin ye, groves beloved! and landscapes of spring! Ah! if.
  Fate should indulge me once more to partake of the silent tranquillity of your solitude! Perhaps the day is not distant. The blue sky shines when the storm is departed, and repose succeeds to pain. Flourish, ye scenes of delight! while I prepare to make my last voyage, in returning to your peaceful shades.'
- * The inundation of the sea, and the bursting of a dyke, happen very frequently, in winter, at Amsterdam.—The Dutch were then on the eve of a war.

THE POEM OF HALLER VERSIFIED.

BY HENRY JAMES PYE, ESQ. P. L.

THE Lover of Polite Literature will be much gratified by the following elegant Verfification of the Poem of Haller, which we have attempted in Profe. This little production, to use one of the Laureat's own classical allusions, will be but interweaving a transient blossom in the laurels of it's amiable Author.

Their verdant arch o'er HASEL's breezy head,
When shall I once again, supinely laid,
Hear Philomela charm your list'ning shade?
When shall I stretch my careless limbs again,
Where, gently rising from the velvet plain,
O'er the green hills, in easy curve that bend.
The mosty carpet Nature's hands extend?
Where all is silent! save the gales that move
The leasy umbrage of the whisp'ring grove;
Or the soft murmurs of the rivulet's wave,
Whose chearing streams the lonely meadows lave.

Q Heav'n !

O Heav'n! when shall once more these eyes be cast.
On scenes where all my spring of life was pass'd;
Where, oft responsive to the falling rill,
Sylvia and Love my arties lays would fill!
While Zephyr's fragrant breeze, soft breathing, stole A pleasing sadness o'er my pensive soul:
Care, and her ghastly train, were far away;
While calm, beneath the sheltering woods, I lay Mid shades, impervious to the beams of day.

Here—sad reverse!—from scenes of pleasure far,

I wage with Sorrow unremitting war:

Oppress'd with grief, my ling'ring moments flow,

Nor aught of joy, or aught of quiet, know.

Far from the scenes that gave my being birth,

From parents far, an outcast of the earth!

In youth's warm hours, from each restriction free,

And checks the neal for wisdom and for fame.
Now droops fond Hope, by Disappointment cross'd;
Chill'd by neglect, each fanguine wish is lost.
O'er the weak mound stern Ocean's billows ride,
And wast destruction in with every tide;
While Mars, descending from his crimson car,
Fans with sierce hands the kindling stames of war.

Her gentle aid let Consolation lend: All human evils hasten to their end.

The

618 PHILOLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The storm abates at every gust it blows:
Past ills enhance the comforts of repose.
He who ne'er selt the pressure of distress,
Ne'er selt returning pleasure's keen excess.
Time, who Affliction bore on rapid wing,
My panting heart to happiness may bring:
I, on my native hills, may yet inhale
The purer instuence of the ambient gale.

Ah! scenes of early joy! ah, much-lov'd shades! Soon may my footsteps tread your vernal glades. Ah! should kind Heav'n permit me to explore. Your seats of still tranquillity once more! E'en now, to Fancy's visionary eye, Hope shews the flattering hour of transport night. Blue shines the æther, when the storm is past. And calm Repose succeeds to Sorrow's blast. Flourish, ye scenes of ever new delight! Wave wide your branches to my raptur'd sight! While, ne'er to roam again, my wearied feet. Seek the kind resuge of your calm retreat.
